The revered author of these Discourses should not be held responsible for their publication. Long since, he gave to the flames far the greater part of his unpublished Sermons. After repeatedly refusing the friend, to whom he had given the scanty remnant, the privilege of publishing a portion of them, he allowed his scruples to be in a measure overcome, at the time of their last interview.

Should any surviving friend of President Walker ask whether he himself valued one of these Sermons above another, we might reply, The only one, hitherto unpublished, which he designated, is that "Upon the Sin of being Led Astray."

INTRODUCTION.

SHOULD there be found any one to ask, "Who was James Walker?" there are many to answer, "He was the man who first made me believe that religion is a real thing: in my college days, the strength of his logic, and the majesty of his earnestness, took my mind and heart captive."

Others, whose memories go back further, will reply, "More than all men else, he was 'a son of consolation' when my house was left unto me desolate." And they will add, "He built up a strong parish from slender beginnings; his church in Charlestown stood like a lighthouse to warn the young, from far and near, of their perils; wherever he preached, he was listened to as if men saw in his every look and word the unmistakable credentials of a 'great ambassador.' In the homes of the people he was simple as a child, yet profound as a philosopher; at one moment overflowing with pungent humor, his countenance the next moment eloquent with pathetic seriousness."

He was a man unrivalled in sententious conversation, one who, in later life, drew toward him the mingled homage and respect of the learned men around him in other chairs of the College which he honored successively as Professor and President; the man on whose counsel the student pre-eminently relied, when his mind was vexed with those problems which concern themselves with the conduct of life, or the choice of a profession. And he lived to grow old; he went gently to his rest with the benedictions of pupils following him from their widely scattered homes, with the gratitude of the broken households who yet survived to revere the Pastor who had served them more than thirty years before.

Never devoid of catholicity of spirit, the vehemence of the youthful theologian became more and more mellowed by a wide course of reading, and through the experience of life, until at last we saw in him an impersonation of the apostolic "meekness of wisdom," the like of which, in this world, we can scarce believe that our eyes shall rest upon again.

Is it too much to hope, that without the magic of that voice which filled all the chambers of the soul which it pierced, without that pleading look which compelled the prodigal to "come to himself," without the kingly silence in which the preacher seemed to stand enthroned, without the retinue of thirsting eyes which we saw fastened upon him, — these words of his, saved from the ashes to which he had almost doomed them, may fan the embers of our better natures into a flame of heartier consecration?

* JAMES WALKER was born in Burlington (near Woburn), Mass., Aug. 16, 1794. He was fitted for Harvard College (which he entered in 1810) under Mr. Caleb Butler, Preceptor of the Groton Academy.

He delivered the second English oration at his graduation, in 1814. Among the classmates gathered before him, when he appeared as their class-orator that year, were the late Rev. Dr. Greenwood, and the historian, Prescott. Upon leaving college, he spent a year at Exeter, N. H., as an assistant teacher in connection with the memorable Dr. Benjamin Abbot, Principal of "Phillips Exeter Academy."

The two subsequent years he passed in the pursuit of his Theological studies at Cambridge, graduating in the class which first left the Divinity School, in 1817.

* In the preparation of this biographical notice, we have been very much aided by a discriminating and beautiful sketch of President Walker, prepared by Professor Joseph Lovering, his life-long friend, for the "American Academy of Arts and Sciences."

After declining an invitation to settle in Lexington, Mass., he was ordained as the Pastor of the Harvard Church in Charlestown, Mass., Feb. 11, 1818. During the twenty-one years of this ministry (which was a ministry to the social and educational interests of the town, as well as to his own parish), he was challenged again and again to come forth as a leader, upon conspicuous occasions. In 1832, he addressed "the citizens of Charlestown upon the one hundredth anniversary of Washington's birth-day." His ringing voice, bidding men "be of good cheer," carried courage to many a faint-hearted church and its youthful minister, upon the day of ordination. The pages of the "Christian Examiner" bear witness to his zeal in "every good word and work." Besides many contributions at other periods to its pages, he was its sole editor between the years 1831 and 1839. But a change of employment was at hand.

He retired from his auspicious ministry in Charlestown, July 14, 1839, that he might become "Alford Professor of Natural Theology, Moral Philosophy, and Civil Polity" in Harvard College. The public foresaw his illustrious career at Cambridge (for his name had been suggested in some quarters as a candidate for President as early as the date of the lamented President Kirkland's resignation in 1828). But we cannot wonder that his devoted parish clung to him to the very last, and interposed every possible solicitation to compel him to decline this invitation to the Alford Professorship. Nor were they wholly alone in their regrets. In the many homes in which Mr. Walker was enthusiastically welcomed, when he made "an exchange of pulpits," there must have been those among old and young, whose hearts sadly testified that this summons, "Friend, go up higher," betokened their being left, far more than before, beyond the range of his voice or the clasp of his hand. After leaving the impress of his character upon many successive classes who were brought into more familiar relations with him than often happens at college, at the expiration of fourteen years

(in 1853) he was transferred from the Professor's chair to the office of President; which latter post he filled with signal ability during the ensuing seven years, until, in 1860, his impaired health counselled his resignation. But this event did not remove him from all concern in the interests of the College which he had loved so intensely all his life; the College towards which he had long since taught the eyes of Charlestown boys to look wistfully. To its councils he had been called thirty-five years previous as Overseer; of its Corporation he had been a member for nineteen years, before he became its President. And now, after a brief respite, we find him once more, for ten years, a member of the Board of Overseers.

He survived his retirement from the Presidency more than fourteen years. He had so meekly borne the honors with which men had crowned him, that these later years of comparative retirement were not rendered insipid from lack of excitement, but were, as he alleged, among his happiest; save only that a portion of them were overshadowed by the death of the wife, who for nearly forty years had been the companion of his studies, and the eager dispenser of his hospitality. Mrs. Catherine Walker (daughter of Dr. George Bartlett of Charlestown, Mass.,) died June 13, 1868, aged 70.

On his eightieth birth-day, Aug. 16, 1874, through the happy instigation of his life-long friend, Rev. Dr. Samuel Osgood, of New York, a beautiful cup and salver were presented to him by friends who had known and loved him in Charlestown, Cambridge, and elsewhere. A few weeks previous, he had the rare felicity of welcoming at his dinner table, upon Commencement Day, seven of his surviving classmates.

Dr. Walker edited "Reid's Essay on the Intellectual Powers, abridged, with notes from Sir William Hamilton," and Dugald Stewart's "Philosophy of the Active and Moral Powers of Man."

In 1840, and for three consecutive years, he delivered courses of lectures, before the Lowell Institute, upon Natural Religion, which excited a very deep and wide-spread interest.

In 1863, a memoir of Hon. Daniel Appleton White, of Salem, Mass., was printed, which Dr. Walker had prepared at the request of the Massachusetts Historical Society; and in 1867, he prepared a memoir, for the same society, of President Quincy.

The fervor of his patriotism was attested alike at the beginning and at the close of our gigantic civil war. In 1861, he published a kindling discourse, delivered in King's Chapel, Boston, upon "The Spirit proper to the Times." The oration which he delivered, in 1863, before the Alumni of Harvard College, remains in its massive simplicity an inspiring memorial of his patriotic counsels.

A former series of sermons was published by him after his retirement from the College Presidency.*

He died Dec. 23, 1874. His remains rest in Forest Hills Cemetery, West Roxbury.

* Dr. Walker testified his attachment to Harvard University in the gift, by his will (with liberal increase), of the timely and generous benefaction which his friends had sent him upon his resigning the office of President. This bequest amounted to fifteen thousand dollars. In addition, he gave the College, in the same instrument, his entire library. He bequeathed one thousand dollars each to the American Unitarian Association, and to the "Society for the Relief of Aged and Indigent Clergymen."

RELIGION NOT A SCIENCE, BUT A WANT.

“As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God! My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?” — PSALM xvii. 1, 2.

THE beautiful and plaintive psalm from which my text is taken appears to be the composition of a Hebrew captive and exile, moaning over his hard fate in being doomed to live in a strange land and among an idolatrous people. Continually derided by those around him for still trusting in Jehovah, by whom he had been to all appearance forsaken; shocked and disgusted by the impure and cruel rites he was witnessing from day to day, — his heart yearned to be back among his countrymen, and take part once more in the only worship which was worship to him, which met and satisfied an irrepressible longing of his spiritual nature. “As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God! My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?"

I am aware of no words in Scripture, nor indeed in any other book, which so strongly express the soul's need of religion. They will therefore introduce very properly what I am going to say on that subject. I cannot help thinking that many perplexities in matters of faith would be cleared up, and many so-called religious controversies be set at rest, if men would accustom themselves to look upon religion not as a science, but as a want.

First of all, let me explain as clearly as I can what is meant when religion is spoken of as being not a science, but a want.

You know how it is with man's relations to society; — society is not a science, but a want. Of course, we can make society a matter of science; that is to say, we can speculate about the origin of society, and about what constitutes a true society, and come to the same or to different conclusions, or to no conclusion, on the subject. But these speculations do not make society any more, or any less, a want of our nature. The want is founded in needs and cravings which pertain to our nature itself, and exist antecedently to all speculation, and independently of it.

So it is with religion. Some, perhaps, will object that there is no analogy between the two laws here supposed ; or, at any rate, that the analogy fails in an essential point. They may say our want of society can be traced back to an instinct implanted in our nature, — the instinct of sympathy ; just as our want of knowledge can be traced back to another instinct implanted in our nature, — the instinct of curiosity : but there is no such special instinct to which we can trace back our want of religion, — the soul's thirst for the living God. To this, however, I would reply : when we refer to special instincts in man we must not make them to be separate entities, the aggregate of which constitutes human nature. Human nature is a single entity ; and these instincts, as that term is here used, are but the spontaneous and controlling tendencies which this nature manifests in the process of its development : and one of these spontaneous and controlling tendencies is to religion, — to religion of some sort or other.

Again, you know how it is with morality ; — morality is not a science, but a want. Of course, we can make morality a matter of science ; that is to say, we can speculate about its foundation and motive and end, and the result will be a system of ethics. But men do not become moral beings by the study of ethics, any more than they become rational beings by the study of logic. Men are moral beings because they have a moral nature ; that is, a conscience, an innate, inextinguishable sense of right, which makes morality to be a want.

In the same sense, and for the same reason, religion is not a science, but a want. I do not mean that there is no such thing as a science of religion ; but this I say, — the scheme of religion is not religion, any more than the science of friendship is friendship. We speculate about God and immortality, about faith and prayer, and the terms of the Divine acceptance, and come to various conclusions ; and these various conclusions constitute our various theologies and creeds, — that is, our science of religion. But mankind were religious long before they had any thing to do with these religions and creeds. Men are religious beings because they have a religious nature ; just as they are social beings because they have a social nature, and moral beings because they have a moral nature.

Religion, therefore, taking the term in its most general acceptation, is a human want ; not so called because a want always felt, but because a foundation is laid in every soul for its being felt at times. It would be just as easy to find a people without a disposition to society, or a sense of moral distinctions, as to find one without any recognition whatever of Divinity, — without reverence, faith, worship, religious aspiration under some form or other, and in some degree or other.

Here, then, is a view of religion quite distinct from the question of the truth or falsity of any particular and definite form of it; quite distinct, also, from a consideration of its moral claims and uses; and yet of great practical moment.

In the first place it helps to clear up what would otherwise be a perplexing fact in history. I mean the existence and prevalence of rude, grotesque, and sometimes savage and cruel modes of faith and worship. A religion which is to supply a natural want will take more or less of its character from the character of the want itself as actually developed and felt at the time. It certainly must have been so with the various forms of paganism; for these were nothing but the growth of a particular state of society and the human mind, and must therefore be expected to betray the limitations, the defects, the vices of their source. And even where the religion originates in an express revelation, we must presume that the whole will be accommodated to the actual capacities and wants of the people and the age. Accordingly we have a succession of revelations, — the patriarchal, the Mosaic, and the Christian. It has been objected to the first two, that they are confessedly imperfect when compared with the last, and therefore cannot have come from a perfect being. But those who take this ground forget that the perfection of a religion consists in its perfect adaptation to its purpose; in other words, that the best religion for any people is not that which is best in itself, but that which will best satisfy their moral and religious wants, — in short, the best which they can bear. “I have yet many things to say unto you.” our Lord is here speaking to the twelve, “but ye cannot bear them now.”

Certainly, therefore, we have the best authority for holding that revelation itself is, and must be, accommodated more or less to the condition of those to whom it is addressed, — to their capacities and their wants. And this applies especially to a public religion; that is, to a religion intended for a whole people, and not merely for the enlightened few.

You will sometimes hear it said that religion is wholly an affair between the individual and his Maker; which is true in one sense, but not in another. Everybody knows that there must be a public as well as a private or personal religion; in other words, there must be a public religion in order that there may be a private or personal religion. — for the latter is nothing but the former individualized, with slight variations. The public religion must also take a positive form; that is to say, it must express itself by means of institutions of faith and worship, which are generally received; and to be generally received, they must be such as the age, the community, the sect are generally in a condition to understand and appreciate. To a certain extent, therefore, it is with the institutions of religion — by which I mean its outward forms and professions — just as it is with the institutions of government. It is to no purpose to say that the truest institutions of government are the best: they are the best if the people are prepared for them, and can bear them; if not, they are the worst. In reading ecclesiastical history, many are offended and disgusted at the superstitions which prevailed in the Church of the Middle Ages. But why this disposition to find fault with what was manifestly a wise ordering of things? A simple and more rational ministration of Christianity would not have taken hold of the imagination and the feelings of the people of that period: that is to say, it would not have satisfied the religious wants of the then existing condition of society; in one word, it would not have answered its purpose.

But is not this to reduce all rites and creeds to a level? — to make one religion as good and as true as another? I answer, No! The best and truest religion, in itself considered, is that which is best for the best people; but it does not follow that it would be best for all people. The stumbling block of the so-called radical reformers consists in ignoring the obvious fact, that minds must be educated up to a condition or capacity to receive the highest truths. The truth, these men will tell you, can never do any harm; which nobody denies, if by truth is meant truth understood; but truth misunderstood, as it will be if men are not prepared for it, is one of the subtlest and often one of the most mischievous of errors. It is still our interest and our duty to seek out and to disseminate the truest exposition of Christianity, — the truest in itself considered; but this can be done in no other way than by preparing ourselves and others to understand and appreciate it. Meanwhile, differences will and must exist. Not different gospels, as some are fond of saying: there is but one Gospel, as there is but one Nature; nothing hinders, however, the one Gospel any more than the one Nature from being variously interpreted. Nay, paradoxical as it may seem, these different interpretations, when adapted to the corresponding differences in men's minds, will so balance and complement each other as actually to promote the only unity and identity we can desire. I mean unity and identity of effect; that is, the satisfaction of the common religious want.

This, then, is the first lesson to be gathered from the doctrine that religion is not a science, but a want. Under a scientific point of view, it is plain

there can be but one absolutely true faith ; it argues however neither wisdom nor piety, but a pitiable self-conceit, in any individual or in any sect to think to have found it. Happily it is not necessary to do so. It suffices, if the humble follower of our Lord has found enough of this truth to make him an earnest, trusting, and devout man. Elevate him if you can into the region of higher and more spiritual wants ; but, taken as he is, that religion is practically the truth for him, which will best answer the ends of religion in his case. Of course, on this principle we must expect diversity, — “ diversities of gifts,” “ differences of administrations,” “ diversities of operations,” — nevertheless, as the Apostle says, “ it is the same God which worketh all in all.” Observe, too, that the practical evils sometimes incident to this diversity do not come from the law of the diversity as here laid down. They come from not understanding, or from attempts to contravene, that law ; in other words, they come either from urging reforms prematurely, — that is, before people are prepared for them, — or else from a struggle to retain and perpetuate institutions which the world has outgrown. Let us hope there is a tendency to agreement and unity in what is absolutely true. And that this tendency may become effective, let all the ways of progress be thrown open ; let the thought of man be as free as the air. What will satisfy him to-day will not probably satisfy him to-morrow ; still it is true to-day as well as to-morrow that that religion is the best for him, which, for the time being, will best satisfy his religious wants, — the cry of his soul “ for God, for the living God.”

Two other lessons are also to be gathered from the doctrine of this discourse, which are more directly practical : the first, respecting what we are to do for others ; the second, respecting what we are to do for ourselves.

It is common for persons of cultivated and refined minds to express surprise and impatience at the superstitious notions and practices which still prevail. These superstitions, however, do but authenticate what has just been said in proof of man's religious nature. Such is the need, the craving, of the human mind for religion of some sort or other, that, rather than have none, it will accept it under the most grotesque and revolting forms. And, this being the case, it follows that the only effectual preventive or cure of superstition is to be found in the inculcation and prevalence of a purer worship. It is to no purpose to deride prevalent superstitions ; it is to no purpose to rail against them ; nay, it is to no purpose to refute them. The bulk of mankind will never be persuaded that their religion, however inadequate and corrupt, is not better than none. Some communication with the mysterious Infinite, some intercourse with the invisible world, they will and must have. If you are dissatisfied with the popular faith, inculcate a better, exhibit the fruits of a better, educate the people up to a capacity for a better; but do not hope to correct the evil of which you complain in any other way; do not think to put down superstition by setting up formalism, or scepticism, or infidelity.

We should also bear in mind that what is wanted is not a philosophy, but a religion. We may have all the argument on our side, and all the learning, and a full proportion of the integrity and honor; yet it will profit us nothing, if we are suspected of being deficient in faith and piety, if we have not an unction from the Holy One. The bulk of the community are not looking round for the truest or the most consistent form of worship, but for that which will best satisfy their religious wants. Hence that sect will be almost sure to be in the ascendant, which gives the most striking and unequivocal signs of seriousness and zeal; which loves the most, and prays the most, and does the most good. Enlightened views of Christianity derive an immense advantage on the intellectual side from the fact that they fall in with the great movements of the age, and with the highest and best thought on other subjects; but this advantage will be more than lost, if the profession of these views fails to be connected with that serious and devout habit of mind which is absolutely indispensable to render any religion popular. Let it, therefore, be universally understood, that the man or the woman who leads the public to associate with any set of religious opinions uncommon sanctity, does more to propagate those opinions than the most triumphant display of logic, or criticism, or eloquence.

Thus much we owe to others and to society. Knowing that there is a want in human nature which will lead either to religion or to superstition, we see at once that the only effectual prevention or cure of superstition is to be found in the prevalence of a pure and rational faith. This faith, therefore, the enlightened and educated classes are under a double motive and obligation to promote by word and deed, by profession and life: first, because it is the only legitimate means of satisfying men's religious wants; and, secondly, because it is the only effectual means of saving the whole community from debasing and ruinous superstitions.

And this is not all. In the last place, therefore, and under the light of the same general principle, let us consider what we are to do for ourselves.

I have said that religion, of some sort or other, is a universal and inextinguishable want ; and this is true. But all men do not feel this want equally, and no one feels it equally at all times ; and, what is more, many who feel their need of religion when they have occasion to use it, do not feel their need of it when they have opportunity to acquire it. There is nothing wonderful here ; for it is just so with the most obvious and universal of our bodily wants, — the want of food. We all feel this want when hungry ; but it is not every one who feels it or recognizes it at other times, so as to be put upon providing the necessary food beforehand. In the same way we all feel our need of religion when we have occasion to resort to it for support or solace, but not always when we have opportunity to acquire it ; or we feel it but in a slight degree, — not sufficiently to induce earnest action. This is our great difficulty, the most serious obstacle to personal religion, as will readily appear on giving a moment's thought to the real springs of human action.

A man is not impelled to the pursuit of any good by his knowledge or opinion of its nature or relative value, but by his feeling of the want of it, and the uneasiness which this feeling creates. The spring of all human activity is in the uneasiness that accompanies desire. As it has been justly said, you may convince a man ever so much that plenty has its advantages over poverty ; you may make him see and own that the handsome conveniences of life are better than pinching and squalid penury, — nevertheless, so long as he is content with the latter and finds no uneasiness in it, he will not move a finger to better his condition. In the same way a man may easily be brought to see and own, in a general view of things, that virtue is a more desirable object than wealth ; still, if from any cause his want of wealth is the most keenly felt, he will bend all his energies to the attainment of that, and let the other go, at least for the present. And so with religion. Men may estimate it in their theories above all earthly possessions, and be perfectly sincere in those estimates ; nevertheless, in point of fact, so long as they can content themselves without it as a habit of mind, or think they can dispense with it for the present, or imagine they already have enough of it, they will be sure to postpone its earnest and serious cultivation to any the most frivolous object which happens from any cause to be uppermost in their feeling of want. No matter how much they need religion, it is only in proportion as they actually feel this need that they will be put upon acquiring it. It is not enough that religion really is the best of things, and that every one needs it above all things; nay, it is not enough that we are made to see and own that religion is the best of things, and that every one needs it above all things. More than that, we must actually feel our want of it; it must become the object of our predominant feeling of want, creating in us an uneasiness which will not let us rest until it is attained. Why is it that the worldly-minded seek first and chiefly the gratification of their worldly ambition, even at the expense of what they know to be far higher and better? Simply and solely because in the existing state of their habits and tastes and prepossessions they long for the former, but do not long for the latter.

Here, then, we behold at a glance both the evil and the remedy. The evil is that we do not feel as we should our need of religion. I do not mean in particular exigencies, but as a habit of mind, as a quality of character; and the remedy is, to quicken or renew this feeling, to unfold and cultivate a sense of our moral and spiritual wants.

There are those, I believe, who think it sufficient evidence that they really do not want virtue and religion, because they do not feel this want. As if all the wants of our nature were upon its surface; as if it was not the effect of every step in human progress to awaken new and higher wants. The want of virtue and the want of religion are real wants of our nature, as much so as the want of knowledge or the want of bread. Nay, more, they are the highest wants of our nature; but before they are felt to be such, education, society, the individual, have something to do. All, I suppose, will agree that a well-conducted Christian education should aim to make the child sensible and alive, as soon as may be, to the highest wants of his highest nature. But who will say that this is attended to as it should be in education as commonly conducted at the present day? On the contrary, are not the prevailing influences, under which the rising generation are growing up, such as to give in most cases a premature development of their animal and earth-born wants,—the want of dress, and luxury, and praise, and money.—while the wants of the soul are not known; or, if known, are not felt; or, if felt, are not encouraged and sedulously cultivated?

What society and the world are not doing for us, we must do with the help of the Holy Spirit for ourselves. And, blessed be God! it is precisely here that the sublime prerogative of reason, or man's capacity of self-inspection, self-activity, and self-culture, are most gloriously revealed. The inferior animals can satisfy the wants of their nature as they arise; and this is all. It is given to man alone, by communion with his own spirit and with the Father of Spirits, by accepting the means of grace and living the life of the Son of God, by familiarity with noble sentiments and noble characters and noble deeds, to unfold the wants of his nature; to unfold them more and more, and to subordinate the lower to the higher, and all to the highest, that mysterious but inextinguishable longing after the Unseen and Eternal. "As the hart panteth after the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God! My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God." And "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled."

MAN'S COMPETENCY TO KNOW GOD.

I APPROACH the subject on which I am now going to address you with unfeigned humility and distrust. Whenever finite minds aspire to know the Infinite Mind, they are admonished, at every step, of the limitation and inadequacy of their highest and best conceptions. After we have done all, we are constrained to say, in the words of the text, “Lo! these are parts of his ways; but how little a portion is heard of him? but the thunder of his power who can understand?”

These very words, however, while representing man's knowledge of God as necessarily partial and imperfect, make it nevertheless to be real and trustworthy as far as it goes. Accordingly they bring up and, to some extent, answer the two great questions, Are we competent to know God? And if so, to what extent?

These questions, I hardly need say, always have been and always will be at the foundation of all religion, natural or revealed. A new interest and importance is also given to them by the turn which infidel speculation has taken of late. The history of unbelief is easily traced. First came criticism, which led men to question every thing. This was the period of scepticism. Many who began with questioning the foundations of religion ended with denying them. This was the period of atheism. There, however, they found themselves pressed by new and unexpected difficulties. To deny is to affirm; it is to affirm a negative, making it necessary that the negative should be proved, which is always of all proofs the most embarrassing and unsatisfactory. The more thoughtful and consistent among them have therefore fallen back from this position and taken another. They do not deny the foundations of religion; they do not even so much as question them: they simply ignore them. It is the period of indifference.

The ground here taken against all positive religion is not only more consistent than any other, but also more specious and more formidable. It is no longer the pride of human reason; on the contrary, it would seem to be dictated by a modest distrust of human reason. It does not, like the atheism of the last century, undertake to account for the origin of things without a God ; it stigmatizes all attempts to account for the origin of things in any way as a vain presumption. It does not dispose of the questions respecting the existence or the attributes of God by answering them, but by refusing to entertain them, as relating to matters which, whether true or not, transcend human intelligence.

And what makes it worse is that language equally strong, in respect to the incompetency of the human intellect, is sometimes met with in the writings of enlightened theologians and devout Christians. These men believe in the existence of God ; but they would seem to do so under the express condition that this existence is wholly and absolutely incomprehensible. Are they aware that, by taking this ground, they are paving the way, however unconsciously, for that form of infidelity or irreligion from which, as I have shown, we now have the most to apprehend? Perhaps the language here objected to, especially when met with in devotional works, is used to express not so much a conviction as a feeling,—a feeling of dependence and self-abasement ; or, more probably still, the words are to be regarded as words of course, like conventional phrases of civility in letters or conversation, — an outward form of respect. However this may be, one thing is clear if any thing is clear. If God, as God, cannot be brought in any way or in any degree under human cognizance, then what those who ignore all religion say, would follow: it would be folly, and worse than folly, to waste our time and thoughts on the subject. On this subject, however, I feel sure that Christians, if they would take the trouble to understand themselves and each other, would find that they do not differ so much as is generally supposed. Certainly we do not apply epithets to God without attaching to them any meaning whatever: we do not call him wise and good, perfect and infinite, without having some notion of what we mean by these terms. What could be more unreasonable than to expect a man to express, he knows not what, in words the meaning of which, in this connection, he does not know? And besides, supposing a man not to know what he had to express, I should like to be informed how it is possible for him to know, after he has done, whether he has expressed it or not. He can know it on the sole condition of being able to compare the expression with the idea, so as to see whether they agree or disagree; but how can he do this if he has no idea, not even an imperfect or indefinite idea?

I am aware of the distinctions sometimes resorted to in this case. To know that God is, we shall be told, is one thing; to know what he is, is another. We should begin by proving that God is, and then learn what he is, not from our own knowledge, but from revelation.

Before proceeding to expose the fallacy in this argument, I would emphatically disclaim all purpose to call in question the importance and necessity of the Christian Revelation, whether considered as a means of confirming or of enlarging our knowledge of God. Without meaning to deny that here and there an individual, like Socrates, for example, might attain to some just conceptions of the Deity by the light of Nature alone, I still think that no positive and public religion ever did exist, or ever will exist, unless purporting to be of divine origin and authority. It would argue an infinite conceit in the religious teachers of a community to expect that their private speculations on such a theme, varying and contradictory as they must needs be, would have much weight with the public or be listened to long. Whatever power or dignity the pulpit has, is owing mainly not to its learning or its eloquence, but to the generally acknowledged fact that it does not speak in its own name, but in that Name which is above every name, and before which every knee should bow.

What, however, has this to do with man's incompetency to know God? At the utmost it only shows, not that God cannot be known, but that he cannot be fully and adequately known without a special revelation, which revelation we have. I care not how much stress you lay on the importance and necessity of the Christian Revelation. Make the gospel to be every thing, and natural religion to be nothing; still I ask you to consider the inconsistency, the manifest inconsistency, of appealing to the gospel for proof that God cannot be known in any way, when, as we are expressly told again and again, the very purpose and object of the gospel is to make God known. "And they shall not teach every man his neighbor, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord; for all shall know me from the least to the greatest." "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent."

But I go farther. I maintain not only that God is known through the gospel, but also that the gospel assumes or implies, in almost every line, that something at least was known of him before; that is, by man's unassisted reason. "For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made; even his eternal power and Godhead." And here, as hinted above, it is to no purpose to say we must begin by proving that God is, and afterwards learn what he is, not from our own knowledge, but from revelation. How can we prove that God is, without first understanding, at least to some extent, what he is? To prove that God exists, we must prove that a being exists possessing those qualities or attributes which make him to be God. But how can we do this while having no conception at all of what those qualities or attributes are? In all legitimate processes of reasoning, the only ground for reliance on the truth of the conclusion is that this conclusion is contained in the premises. But if we do not know, in any way or in any degree, what the conclusion means, what right have we to affirm, or even to conjecture, whether it is contained in the premises or not? So much, therefore, I hold to be incontrovertible: our knowledge must go as far as our proofs go. In other words, we cannot prove we know not what.

Nor is this all. Why do we believe in the truth of what is revealed in the Scriptures respecting God? On the evidence of miracles, it will be said. Make the most, however, of these miracles; in themselves considered they prove this only, that the revelation has the sanction of a Power which is able to suspend or overrule the laws of Nature.

To convert them, therefore, into a proof of the Christian revelation, we must first assume that God would not exert this power himself, or permit any other being to exert it, in order to sanction an imposture. Unless we assume all this beforehand, and unless we have a right to assume it, the argument from miracles, as all must allow, is not valid. Now, on what ground do we assume it? Evidently on this, that it is not consistent with God's moral attributes to permit a miracle to be wrought in attestation of what is not true. And this reasoning is good; but only on one condition, to wit, that we know what these attributes are: for if we do not, how can we know what is or is not consistent with them?

Moreover, we say as Christians, and say truly, that God has revealed what he is; but how has he revealed it? Immediate revelation is out of the question at the present day, except at any rate in very extraordinary cases. The Christian revelation was made more than eighteen centuries ago; it has been transmitted by means of human language, and exclusively, as Protestants contend, in a book. "The Bible, and the Bible only, is the religion of Protestants." Now what does the Bible reveal respecting the Divine attributes? Is it merely that God should be called wise and good, perfect and infinite? Is it a matter of words only?

Certainly not. It is not the words considered merely as spoken sounds or written characters, but the sense of the words, which constitutes the revelation. Obviously, therefore, it is only in so far as we have not only the words, but the sense of the words, that the revelation is a revelation to us.

This, then, is the conclusion to which I am brought. It may strike some, at first sight, as a commendable humility to allege the incomprehensibility of God; but if we push this doctrine to the extreme, if we take it to the letter, it will be at the peril of all religion, revealed as well as natural. As one of the old divines of the Church of England<sup>1</sup> has said: "To give no other account of the nature of God and his ways, than that they are unintelligible, is to encourage the atheist, and yield him the day; for that is the thing he does chiefly applaud himself in, that he is secure there is neither head nor foot in the mysteries of religion, and that the very notion of a God implies a contradiction to our faculties." This danger, then, was seen to exist two hundred years ago; how much more at the present day, when, as I have shown, it will have the effect to play directly into the hands of the latest form of infidelity! Indeed, it is not easy to see what material advantage, in a practical point of view, the theist would have over the atheist, or the Christian over the pagan, if neither the theist nor the Christian knows any thing of God, except that he exists, — nothing of his nature or character; nothing, that is, which he can reason either to or from in the way of conviction or instruction, of warning or comfort or hope.

Accordingly I cannot, I will not, believe that any thoughtful Christian, however he may sometimes express himself in his humility, or his perplexities, or for the honor of faith on this subject, really means to be understood as saying that God is incomprehensible in the sense of being wholly and absolutely unintelligible. I cannot, I will not, believe that under the accumulated lights of a better civilization, a more spiritual philosophy, and the Christian revelation, he would still have us go on and erect altars, as they did of old, with this inscription, "TO THE UNKNOWN GOD."

But here another question arises of greater difficulty and delicacy. Granting man's competency to know God, how far does this competency extend? Granting that something can be known even of the divine attributes and perfections, how much can be known?

In the first place, we are able to conceive of those qualities and operations of the Divine mind, in which we are permitted in some humble measure to share. When we say that God is wise and just and benevolent, we know what we mean; we mean that he is wise and just and benevolent as men sometimes are, only in an infinitely higher degree. The mere circumstance that God's wisdom, justice, and benevolence are infinite does not alter the essential nature of these qualities; does not make them to be any thing more or less than wisdom, justice, and benevolence. You know how it is with space. The mere circumstance that space is infinite does not alter its essential nature; as space, it is still essentially the same thing as far as it goes, whether limited or unlimited. And so of the divine wisdom or knowledge; knowledge is still knowledge, whether finite or infinite. No doubt God has modes of knowing, and objects of knowledge, which we can neither understand nor conceive of; nevertheless, knowledge itself — that is, to know, simply considered and as far as it goes — must be essentially the same in all knowing beings. So likewise of God's moral perfections. I do not suppose that we can now see in all cases the justice and benevolence of the divine government; but this is owing to the limitation of our present views compared with the vastness and complexity of the scheme. We still hold that the scheme itself, in all its vastness and in all its details, alike in its means and in its ends, is in strict accordance with justice and benevolence, and with justice and benevolence as we understand them. We know what wisdom and justice and benevolence are in God, because we know what wisdom and justice and benevolence are in ourselves, — the latter answering to the former, not indeed in degree, but yet in essence and in kind, from the fact that God has created us, as the Bible says, in his own image.

I am aware that the ground here taken has been questioned even by Christians. Thus the author of “The Light of Nature Pursued” contends that “the faculties and operations of man differ in kind, as well as degree, from those of his Maker.” According to this writer, instead of holding that man is really made after the likeness of God, it would be much nearer the truth to say “that the idea of God is taken from the likeness of man.” We select the powers and endowments by which we ourselves are most distinguished, and after separating from them all we deem a weakness or imperfection, and heightening them to the utmost pitch that imagination can reach, we make the aggregate to be our idea of God; not because it corresponds to the reality, but because we can conceive of nothing better.

You will observe that writers of this class do not regard the names they apply to God as expressing what he is ; they use them merely as titles of respect and honor. But is this according to the Scriptures, or the obvious purpose and use of religion, or the general understanding of religious men ? I think not. When we aver that God is wise and just and good, it is because we see, or think we see, evidence in his works and word that he really possesses those very qualities. And, besides, all religious trust proceeds on the assumption that God is wise and just and good, and in the sense in which men are so, only infinitely more entirely and perfectly. Make truth and justice to be one thing in God and another thing in man, not only in degree but also in kind, and after that, even though we have the gospel in our hands, how could we tell what to believe or what to expect ; what to hope or what to fear ?

There is also a still more radical defect in the doctrine under consideration. It does not recognize the divine element in the human soul. In other words, it does not recognize the identity of basis, if I may so express it, of all spiritual natures and all spiritual life ; without which no foundation is laid for that oneness in the Father, that becoming "partakers of the divine nature," that life of God in the soul of man, of which the Scriptures continually speak, and on which they make all our heavenly aspirations to turn. Neither is it in the Scriptures alone that we have assurance of these divine affinities; they are testified to in the unutterable yearnings and longings of the spiritually minded men of all religions in all ages.

Thus far therefore, as it seems to me, we may safely go. We can know the moral and intellectual attributes of God, because they are reflected however faintly in ourselves, inasmuch as the human mind is made after the likeness of the Divine mind. But what shall we say of those incommunicable properties which belong to God alone as the infinite One? Can we know any thing of them?—and if so, how much?

God is revealed to us, in the universe and in the Scriptures, as an intelligent cause or force; and we know what this is, for every human mind is to a certain extent an intelligent cause or force. But in us the force, and the intelligence which directs it, are dependent on other things, and consequently are to this extent limited by other things. When however we suppose these limits away, as, in the case of a Being who has nothing to limit him, we must, then the force and the intelligence become infinite. To the reason, therefore, God stands revealed as infinite. Neither is this a merely negative revelation, helping us to know what God is not; namely, that he is not finite: for to know positively that God is, and at the same time that he is not finite, is to know positively that he is infinite. We also have a right to reason from this knowledge, and we do reason from it every day, in respect to many of the difficulties which trouble our faith. Even though it may not always enable us to explain away the difficulty, it will help to reconcile us to it; in other words the difficulty will cease to trouble us as an objection, when we consider that many things which are impossible with men must be possible with God.

Here then we see the reality and the importance, and at the same time the extent and the limits, of our knowledge of God as an Infinite Being. We find no difficulty in understanding that such a being exists; and, if he exists, we know that many things which are impossible with us must be possible with him: but how possible, we can neither know nor conceive.

Hence what are called the mysteries of religion, — the mysteries of creation, the mysteries of Providence, the mysteries of grace. It would be well if the Church had always known how to accept these mysteries without making them the occasion of strife and tyranny. I certainly cannot agree with those who contend that, “where the mystery begins, religion ends.” But this I say, where the mystery begins, dogmatism should end, — dogmatism for, and dogmatism against. In order to turn a mystery into a dogma and impose it as a creed, you must first define it ; but, as soon as you have defined a mystery, the mystery is gone. What remains is probably an unmeaning paradox, or it may be a ghastly contradiction.

It is well that we should know as much of God as is revealed in his works and word ; and it is well that we should not pretend to know any more. When we pray, “ O Lord, touch our hearts, that we may know the mysteries of the Kingdom of Heaven ! ” it is not that we may see through these mysteries so as to be able to understand them as we do ordinary occurrences, but only that we may know how to use them for spiritual edification. Mysteries are not for noisy debate, they are for devout meditation ; they are not for the faith of the understanding, they are for the faith of the heart, — now to inspire and exalt, and now to overawe and subdue.

It is not enough considered that religious thought has two purposes ; one of which is to enlighten, the other to move and impress. In the latter case, the very obscurity and indefiniteness of the thought often minister to its efficacy. Doubtless we are more enlightened by what is clearly seen ; but it is equally certain that we are often more moved and impressed by what is seen only in part, by what is darkly suggested. Hence the secret of much of that mysterious and overpowering fascination which takes hold of most men amidst sublime scenes, and chains them to the spot. Neither is it in cultivated minds alone that this craving for the vague immense is revealed. Why does the savage pause in his midnight journey to gaze into the fathomless depths of the clear and tranquil heavens? What arrests his step on the sea-shore, and makes him look abroad on the boundless expanse of waters with a strange mingling of emotions which he cannot describe, and for which he has as yet no name? It is the instinctive sentiment of the infinite, struggling after an object with which to be satisfied and filled. That object is found in God alone, half understood and half not understood. As an old English writer has said with his accustomed quaintness: "Ever since our minds became so dim-sighted as not to pierce into that original and primitive blessedness which is above, our wills are too big for our understandings, and will believe their beloved prey is to be found where reason discovers it not. They will pursue it through all the vast wilderness of this world, and force our understandings to follow the chase with them; nor may we think to tame this violent appetite, or allay the heat of it, except we can look upwards to some Eternal and Almighty Goodness, which is alone able to master it.”<sup>1</sup>

Let no one say, therefore, that our knowledge of God is less real or less effective because it is incomplete and imperfect. If we could comprehend the infinite as we comprehend the finite, theology might be a gainer, but religion would suffer. Religion, it cannot be repeated too often, is intended to supply not so much an intellectual as a moral and spiritual want. It addresses itself to our aspirations; not so much to the curiosity of men and the speculative understanding, as to the sentiments, and especially to that mystical but most characteristic sentiment in human nature, the desire in man to raise himself above himself.

Why then should we be unwilling to admit, as the final and crowning source of our knowledge of God, a practical, a direct, or if you will a mystical, insight into divine things? — a something in faith and worship, and in the thoughts which inform and inspire both, which the devout soul feels and knows, but which no logic can analyze and no language express? I speak not now of that false mysticism from which the world and the Church have suffered so much and so long; which disdains the wisdom it might gather from daily experience, and imagines impossible communications with the spiritual world. I mean a true mysticism, which is favorable if not necessary to the life and warmth of a sober and rational piety, — a mysticism which supposes a real communion of the soul with its Maker; which loves in order to know, instead of knowing in order to love; which knows the divine from sympathy with it, — a mysticism which holds no unintelligible language in speaking of things seen or unseen, which makes no boast of its inward experiences, nor construes them into an authority to dictate to others, — a mysticism, in fine, which understands that “faith without works is dead,” which loves and serves the finite beings within its reach; and, when the question is of the Infinite, believes, adores, and is still.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF MAN'S SPIRITUAL NATURE IN REGARD TO THE FOUNDATIONS OF FAITH.

"Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." — HEB. xi. 1.

FAITH is defined in Scripture as being "the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." By it we can and do regard many things which lie beyond the sphere of our senses and actual experience as really existing, and are affected by them as realities. By it the spiritually minded of all religious persuasions, in proportion as they are spiritually minded, feel a confidence and practical assurance in the existence and reality of the spiritual world. It is this principle which constitutes man, unlike the inferior animals, a religious being; and it is by a right development of this principle that we become capable of seeing Him who is invisible, of being affected by those things which pertain to our inward and spiritual life as if addressed to the senses, and of holding free, intimate, and habitual communion with the Unseen, the Infinite, and the Eternal.

Now it is remarkable of the infidelity of the present day, that it strikes at the very existence of this principle considered as an element or property of the human soul. Not content with disputing in detail the evidences of natural and revealed religion, or driven perhaps from this ground, it thinks to cut the matter short by denying that man has any faculties for the apprehension of spiritual existences, or of any existences but such as are cognizable by the senses, and so far as they are cognizable by the senses. I have no fears that many amongst us, or that any who are accustomed to contemplate and study the workings of their moral and spiritual nature, will be seduced and carried away by this gross form of sensualism, which they must feel and know to be contradicted and entirely set aside by the facts of their own inward experience. Still it may be well in connection with the evidences of Christianity, to begin by setting forth, in the simplest and clearest language of which the subject is susceptible, the true philosophy of man's moral and spiritual nature in regard to the foundations of faith.

In the present discourse I shall endeavor to establish, illustrate, and enforce, as much at length as my limits will permit, the three following propositions: —

First, that a little reflection will convince every one alive to noble thoughts and sentiments, that the existence of those spiritual faculties and capacities, which are assumed as the foundation of religion in the soul of man, is attested and put beyond controversy by the revelations of consciousness.

Secondly, that religion in the soul, consisting as it does of a manifestation and development of these spiritual faculties and capacities, is as much a reality in itself, and enters as essentially into our idea of a perfect man, as the corresponding manifestation and development of the reasoning faculties, a sense of justice, or the affections of sympathy and benevolence.

And, thirdly, that from the acknowledged existence and reality of spiritual impressions or perceptions we may and do assume the existence and reality of the spiritual world; just as, from the acknowledged existence and reality of sensible impressions or perceptions, we may and do assume the existence and realities of the sensible world.

These three propositions being established, it will follow that our conviction of the existence and reality of the spiritual world is resolvable into the same fundamental law of belief as that on which our conviction of the existence and reality of the sensible world depends.

I. My first proposition is, that a little reflection will convince every one alive to noble thoughts and sentiments, that the existence of those spiritual faculties and capacities, which are assumed as the foundation of religion in the soul of man, is attested and put beyond controversy by the revelations of consciousness.

Some writers contend for the existence of an unbroken chain of beings, starting from the lowest form of inorganic matter, and mounting upwards by regular and insensible gradations to the highest order of created intelligences. Others insist on a division of substances into material and immaterial, and make one of the principal arguments for the soul's spirituality and immortality to depend on the nature of its substance, and not on the nature of the laws and conditions imposed upon it. Happily, neither of these questions is necessarily implicated in the views I am about to offer, and both may therefore be dismissed at once from the discussion; the former as being a little too fanciful, and the latter as being a little too metaphysical, for the generality of minds. It is enough if persons will recognize the obvious fact, that in the ascending scale of being, as the vegetable manifests some properties which do not belong to crude and inert matter, and as the animal manifests some properties which do not belong to the mere vegetable, so man as man manifests some properties which do not belong to the mere animal. He is subject, it is true, to many of the laws and conditions of crude and inert matter, to many of the laws and conditions of vegetable life, and to many of the laws and conditions of animal life ; but he also has part in a still higher life, — the life of the soul. He brings into the world the elements of a higher life, the life of the soul ; the acknowledged phenomena of which can no more be resolved into the laws and conditions of mere sensation, than into those of vegetation or mere gravitation. This higher life, — consisting among other things of a development of conscience, the sentiment of veneration, and the idea of the perfect and the absolute, — constitutes the foundation of religion in the soul of man ; the existence and reality of which is attested, as I hold, and is put beyond controversy, by the revelations of consciousness.

I do not suppose, of course, that the existence of the above-mentioned properties or affections of the soul is matter of sensation. I do not suppose that we can see, or hear, or feel, or taste, or smell a mental faculty, a moral sentiment, or an idea.

Their existence, supposing them to exist, could be revealed to us by consciousness alone ; and by consciousness it is revealed to us : and the evidence of consciousness in a question of this nature is final and decisive. It is not a matter of sensation nor of logic, but of consciousness alone. We are conscious of their existence ; and being so, whatever we may say or however we may argue to the contrary, we cannot, practically speaking, doubt it, even if we would, any more than we can doubt the testimony of the senses. Reflect for one moment. What evidence have you of the existence of your own mind, — of the power of thought, or even of the power or the fact of sensation itself, — but the evidence of consciousness ? Nay, what evidence have you of your own individual being and personality, — that you are yourself, and not another ; that you are a man, and not a horse or a tree ; that you are awake and alive, and not asleep or dead, — but the evidence of consciousness ? None whatever. You can say, “ I am conscious of being what I am ; ” and that is all you can say. An archangel cannot say any thing more. It is not a matter of sensation or of argument, but of consciousness alone. If, therefore, you are conscious of possessing not only a sensual and an intellectual, but also a moral and spiritual nature, you have as good evidence for believing that this moral and spiritual nature really exists, and that you possess it, as you have for believing that you exist at all.

“True,” the sensualist<sup>1</sup> may say, “this does prove the existence of something which we call our moral and spiritual nature; but it does not prove that this something belongs to our original constitution, that it has its root and foundation in the soul, that it cannot be resolved into a mere figment of the brain.” And then, in the accustomed vein of this philosophy, he will be likely to urge: “Your conscience, — what is it? One thing in the child, and another thing in the man; one thing in this age or country, and another thing in that; here expressly forbidding what there it as expressly enjoins. And your sentiment of veneration, — what is it? To-day prostrate before sticks and stones, to-morrow adoring the host of heaven; among one people deifying a virtue, among another a man, among another an onion; now manifesting itself under the forms of the grossest superstition, and now breaking out into the excesses of the wildest fanaticism. And your idea of the Absolute and the Perfect, — what is it but an hallucination of the metaphysically mad; the finite vainly thinking to comprehend the infinite? Do not all these things therefore, though they exist or are thought to exist in the human mind, when a little more carefully examined, look very much like figments of the brain ? ”

How long is the plain, practical good sense of mankind to be abused by a sophistry like this, which owes all its apparent force and pertinency to a sort of logical sleight-of-hand, that, with a quickness making it imperceptible to slow minds, substitutes for the real question at issue another having nothing to do with the subject? So far as the present discussion is concerned, it matters not whether conscience, as already instructed and educated, always decides correctly, or never decides correctly. I am not contending, as everybody must perceive who is capable of understanding the argument, for the correctness or uniformity of the decisions of conscience, — a circumstance which must depend of course on the nature and degree of instruction and education it has received, — but for the existence of conscience itself, not as a figment of the brain, but as an element of our moral and spiritual nature. What I maintain is simply this: that every man is born with a moral faculty, or the elements of a moral faculty, which, on being developed, creates in him the idea of a right and a wrong in human conduct; which leads him to ask the question, “What is right?” or,

“What ought I to do?” which summons him before the tribunal of his own soul for judgment on the rectitude of his purposes; which grows up into an habitual sense of personal responsibility, and thus prepares him, as his views are enlarged, to comprehend the moral government of God, and to feel his own responsibility to God as a moral governor. My reasonings and inferences, therefore, are not affected one way or another by the actual state of this or that man's conscience, or by the fact that probably no two consciences can be found which exactly agree. A man's conscience we must presume, according to the influences under which he has acted, will be more or less excited and developed, and more or less enlightened and educated. Still, we hold it to be undeniable that every man has a conscience to be excited and developed, enlightened and educated; that in this sense conscience has its root and foundation in the soul; and that man herein differs essentially from the most sagacious of the inferior animals, and, unlike them, was originally constituted susceptible of religion.

And so, too, of the sentiment of veneration or devotion, considered as an original and fundamental propensity of the human mind, I care not so far as my present purpose is concerned under what forms it has manifested itself, or to what excesses or abuses it has led. These very excesses and abuses only serve to demonstrate the existence and strength of the principle itself, as they evince such a craving of our nature for religion that it will accept of any, even the crudest and most debasing, rather than have none. Could this be, if we were not made to be religious? No matter what may be the immediate or ostensible object of this sentiment, — a log, a stone, or a star; the god of the hills, or the god of the plains; “Jehovah, Jove, or Lord,” — still it is veneration, still it is devotion. Neither can the principle itself, by any show of evidence or just analysis, be resolved into a mere figment of the brain or a mere creature of circumstances; for, in some form or other, it has manifested itself under all circumstances and in every stage of the mind’s growth, as having its root and foundation in the soul. The sentiment may be, and often has been, misdirected and perverted; but there is the sentiment still, with nothing to hinder its being excited, developed, and directed aright: and the result is religion. There is the sentiment disposing man to look upward to a higher power, and inducing faith in the invisible; a quality in which the most sagacious of the inferior animals do not share in the smallest degree, and which proves, if final causes prove any thing, that man was made for worship and adoration.

One word more respecting our capacity to form an idea of the Absolute and the Perfect. The shallow and flippant jeer, that it is the finite vainly thinking to comprehend the infinite, comes from substituting the literal sense of the term comprehend, as applied to bodies, for its figurative sense as applied to minds ; making the comprehension of an idea to resemble the grasping or embracing of a globe with the hands or the arms. Besides, we need not say that man can, strictly speaking, comprehend the Absolute and the Perfect, but only that he can apprehend them as really existing ; and there is this difference between the literal import of apprehension and a full comprehension, that one can lay hold of what he would not think to be able at once to clasp. However this may be, it is certain that the idea of the infinite grows up in the human mind as it is cultivated and expanded, and becomes an essential condition of thought. As a proof of this, let any one try and see if he can separate the idea of infinity from his idea of space and duration ; or, in other words, whether he can possibly conceive of mere space or mere duration as otherwise than infinitely extended. Moreover, the very idea of imperfection, as such, involves at least some faint glimmering of an idea of the perfect with which it is compared, and without which imperfection would be to us as perfection. In other words, if we had no idea of perfection we could have no idea of its absence, which is what we mean by imperfection. So likewise in contemplating things accidental and dependent, the idea of the Absolute grows up in the mind, — the idea of something that is not accidental and dependent, and on which every thing that is accidental and dependent leans and is sustained. In short, the mind of man is so constituted, that in the full development of its intellectual powers it can find no real satisfaction, no resolution of its doubts and difficulties, but in the idea of the Absolute and the Perfect. Take away this idea, and existence itself becomes an enigma, a meaningless and objectless phantasm. Give us back this idea, and it again becomes a consistent, intelligible, and magnificent whole. Man, unlike the most sagacious of the inferior animals, is so constituted that this reaching after the Absolute and the Perfect enters into and forms an essential element of his moral and spiritual nature, giving him not only a capacity but a predisposition for that faith which is “the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen.”

Therefore do we say, and say confidently, that a foundation for religion is laid in the soul of man, the existence whereof is attested and put beyond controversy by the revelations of consciousness.

This is my first proposition, and I have only to add in respect to it two brief suggestions. If, as we have seen, a foundation for religion is laid in the soul of man, can we bring ourselves to believe for one moment that it is laid there for nothing? And again, if, as we have seen, a foundation for a higher life than that of the senses is laid in the soul of man, must it not be accounted a sort of insanity in us, to say nothing of its sinfulness, to refuse or neglect to build upon it?

II. Here my second proposition comes in, which asserts that religion in the soul, consisting as it does of a manifestation and development of our spiritual faculties and capacities, is as much a reality in itself, and enters as essentially into the idea of a perfect man, as the corresponding manifestation and development of the reasoning powers, a sense of justice, or the affections of sympathy and benevolence.

Modern philosophy has revived an important distinction, much insisted on by the old writers, between what is subjectively true and real — that is to say, true and real so far as the mind itself is concerned — and what is objectively true and real, that is to say, true and real independently of the mind. Thus we affirm of things, the existence of which is reported by the senses, that they really exist both subjectively and objectively; that is to say, that the mind is really affected as if they existed, and that, independently of this affection of the mind, the things themselves exist. In other words, we have an idea of the thing really existing in the mind, and this is subjective truth and reality; and there is also an object answering to that idea really existing out of the mind, and this is objective truth and reality. One sense therefore there certainly is, in which the most inveterate sceptic must allow that religion has a real and true existence to the really and truly devout. Subjectively it is real and true, whether objectively it is real and true or not. All must admit that it is true and real so far as the mind itself is concerned, even though it cannot be shown to have existence independently of the mind. It is a habit or disposition of soul, and in any view of the matter the habit or disposition truly and really exists. It is a development of our nature, a development of character, and as such is as true and real as any other development of nature and character. Even if it feeds on illusions, it is not itself an illusion. Even if in its springing up it depends on nothing better than a fancy, a dream, its growth in the soul and the fruit of that growth are realities, — all-important, all-sustaining realities.

I dwell on this distinction, because it is one which the sensualists, from policy or perversity, would fain wink out of sight, making the question at issue to be, whether religion is or is not a mere illusion. This is not the question. Take any view of the matter, take the sensualist's view of the matter, and still it is undeniable that religion itself as it exists in the soul of the devout is a reality, as much so as any other habit or disposition of soul, as much so as taste, or conscience, or parental or filial affection; and its effects are as real.

Nor is this all. Religion in the soul enters essentially into our idea of a perfect man. Suppose a man perfect in his limbs, features, and bodily proportions, but entirely destitute of understanding; would he answer to anybody's idea of a perfect man? No. Give him then a perfect understanding, but still let him be entirely destitute of moral sensibility, — as dead to sentiment as before he was to thought, — would he answer to anybody's idea of a perfect man? No. And why not? Because we mean by a perfect man one in whom the whole nature of man is developed in its proper order, and just relations and proportions. Now, as has been demonstrated, a foundation for religion is laid in the human soul. In other words, we have spiritual faculties and capacities as well as intellectual and moral faculties and capacities; and the former constitute a part of our nature as truly as the latter; and this part of our nature must be developed. Otherwise the entire man is not put forth. Part of his nature, and of his higher nature too, it may be said, is yet to be born; and thus it is that a deep and true philosophy re-asserts and confirms the Christian doctrine of regeneration. We are born at first into the visible or sensible world; when we become alive to the invisible or spiritual world, we may be said to be born again: and it is not till after this second birth that we become all which, as men, we are capable of becoming. It is not, I repeat it, until after this second birth, consisting as I have said in a development of our spiritual faculties and capacities, that the entire man is revealed, or our idea of a perfect man realized or approached.

Every well constituted mind must be painfully conscious of this truth, though often without being aware of the cause of its uneasiness, in reading the lives or contemplating the fame of men of eminence, and sometimes perhaps of integrity and philanthropy, but destitute of religion. Doubtless a man may have some of the forms of greatness and goodness without having all; and nothing can be farther from my purpose or disposition than to derogate from any form of either, wherever found and however connected. Still, when we behold a manifestation of the lower forms of greatness and goodness without the higher, an impression is left on the mind similar to what is universally felt on seeing a foundation laid for a noble structure, and that structure carried up far enough with the richest materials to indicate the grand and comprehensive plan of the architect, which plan, however, from some cause has been interrupted and broken off midway.

Thus far have I reasoned, as you will perceive, from what consciousness attests and puts beyond controversy respecting the moral and spiritual nature of man. Waiving the question whether any thing exists out of the mind corresponding to our idea of religion in the mind, — waiving the question whether the objects of our faith have a true and real existence independently of the mind itself, — still the conclusion, as we have seen, is unavoidable, that this faith has its foundation in human nature; that its development is a true and real development of our nature; and that it is absolutely essential to our nature's entire and perfect development. Whether religion exists independently of the mind or not, we know that, to those who have it, it has a true and real existence in the mind; that it is a source of true and real strength, solace, and hope; and that men, as men, can truly and really do bear and enjoy with it what they could not do, bear, or enjoy without it. Even therefore if the discussion were to stop here, it would follow incontestably that to disown or neglect religion because of this or that real or supposed logical difficulty, would be to do violence at the same time to both those instinctive desires, from one or the other of which it is said a rational being as such must always act, — a desire of happiness and a desire of perfection.

III. But the discussion does not stop here. I maintain, and this is my third and last proposition, that, from the acknowledged existence, and reality of spiritual impressions or perceptions, we may and do assume the existence and reality of the spiritual world; just as, from the acknowledged existence and reality of sensible impressions or perceptions, we may and do assume the existence and reality of the sensible world.

Most of you, I presume, are apprised of the extravagance of scepticism into which men have been betrayed by insisting on a kind of evidence of which the nature of the case does not admit. Some have denied the existence of the spiritual world; others have denied the existence of the sensible world; and others again have denied the existence of both worlds, contending for that of impressions or perceptions alone. These last, if we are to believe in nothing but the facts of sensation, and what can be logically deduced from these facts, are unquestionably the only consistent reasoners.

For what logical connection is there between a fact of sensation, between an impression or perception, and the real existence of its object, or of the mind that is conscious of it? None whatever. I do not mean that a consistent reasoner will hesitate to admit the real existence of the objects of sensation. Practically speaking, he cannot help admitting their real existence if he would. Every man, woman, and child believes in his or her own existence, and in that of the outward universe or sensible world; but not because the existence of either is susceptible of proof by a process of reasoning. Not the semblance, not the shadow, of a sound logical argument can be adduced in proof of our own existence or that of the outward universe. We believe in the existence of both, it is true; but it is only because we are so constituted as to make it a matter of intuition. Let it be distinctly understood, therefore, that our conviction of the existence of the sensible world does not rest on a logical deduction from the facts of sensation, or of sensation and consciousness. It rests on the constitution of our nature. It is resolvable into a fundamental law of belief. It is held, not as a logical inference, but as a first principle. With the faculties we possess, and in the circumstances in which we are placed, the idea grows up in the mind, and we cannot expel it if we would.

Now the question arises, On what does a devout man's conviction of the existence and reality of the spiritual world depend? I answer, On the very same. He is conscious of spiritual impressions or perceptions, as he also is of sensible impressions or perceptions; but he does not think to demonstrate the existence and reality of the objects of either by a process of reasoning. He does not take the facts of his inward experience, and hold to the existence and reality of the spiritual world as a logical deduction from these facts, but as an intuitive suggestion grounded on these facts. He believes in the existence and reality of the spiritual world, just as he believes in his own existence and reality, and just as he believes in the existence and reality of the outward universe, — simply and solely because he is so constituted that with his impressions or perceptions he cannot help it. If he could, it would be to begin by assuming it to be possible that his faculties, though in a sound state and rightly circumstanced, may play him false; and if he could begin by assuming this as barely possible, there would be an end to all certainty. Demonstration itself, ocular or mathematical, would no longer be ground of certainty. It is said that sophistical reasoning has sometimes been resorted to in proof of the existence and reality of the spiritual world; and this perhaps is true: but the error has consisted in supposing that any reasoning is necessary. It is not necessary that a devout man's conviction of the existence and reality of the spiritual world should rest on more or on better evidence than his conviction of the existence and reality of the sensible world; it is enough that it rests on as much, and on the very same. It is enough that both are resolvable, as I have shown, into the same fundamental law of belief; and that, in philosophy as well as in fact, this law ought to exclude all doubt in the former case, as well as in the latter.

But how, it may be asked, according to the views here presented, can we account for the fact of such different and conflicting spiritual impressions or perceptions? If a spiritual world really exists, why do not all men apprehend it alike? Because, I hardly need reply, it is contemplated under such widely different aspects, and by persons whose spiritual faculties and capacities are variously developed, and above all because in spiritual things the best people are so prone to mix up and confound their inferences with their simple perceptions. There is nothing, therefore, in the real or apparent diversity of our spiritual impressions or perceptions which should shake our confidence in the principle, that, to a rightly constituted and fully developed soul, moral and spiritual truth will be revealed with a degree of intuitive clearness and certainty equal at least to that of the objects of sense. Besides, a like diversity in our views and theories prevails in respect to the material world; but nobody thinks, merely on the strength of this, seriously to raise a doubt whether the material world exists at all. And it is further urged, that the most spiritual men may sometimes be tempted to say of their religious experience, "Perhaps it may turn out to be an illusion;" yet it should be recollected that this is no more than what they may also, in moments of inquietude and despondency, be tempted to say of all their experience. They may say of all their experience, "Perhaps it may turn out to be an illusion." At this very moment, when I seem to myself to be writing a discourse on the Christian evidences, how do I know but that really I am in my bed dreaming about it? We may talk in this way, I know, about dreams, illusions, visions; but it is certain that to a well constituted and well ordered mind it never has occasioned any real doubt or difficulty, nor ever can, in regard to ordinary life; and for the same reason neither ought it to do so in regard to the life of the soul.

Once more. What, according to the doctrine advocated in these pages, shall we reply to those who may affirm that they never had any of our alleged spiritual impressions or perceptions? Precisely what we should to those who might say that they never had any of our alleged moral impressions or perceptions ; any sense of justice, or honor, or disinterested benevolence, or natural affection. We should reply, — that we are very sorry for it. If, however, along with their scepticism they evince any love of the truth, any desire or willingness to have their doubts dispelled, any tenderness of conscience or of soul, we may reason with them, and not without some prospect of convincing them that their want of faith is to be ascribed to one or both of the two following causes : either to a vicious or defective development of their nature, or to their insisting on a kind of evidence, of which the subject, from its very nature, is not susceptible. Either, from some defect or vice of their peculiar moral constitution or training, they are not prepared to appreciate the only appropriate or possible evidence in the case ; or, from ignorance of true philosophy, they require the sort of evidence for truths addressed to one faculty, which is available only in regard to truths addressed to another. By insisting on these topics, it is not improbable that many apparent atheists may be reclaimed. “ In days of crisis and agitation,” says an eminent French philosopher, “ together with reflection, doubt and scepticism enter into the minds of many excellent men, who sigh over and are affrighted at their own incredulity. I would undertake their defence against themselves ; I would prove to them that they always place faith in something. . . . When the scholar has denied the existence of God, hear the man ; ask him, take him at unawares, and you will see that all his words imply the idea of God ; and that faith in God is, without his knowledge, at the bottom of his heart.”<sup>1</sup>

As for the rest, the propagandists of atheism, the men who love atheism from eccentricity, or misanthropy, or deadness of soul, — I say it with submission, but I say it with the utmost possible confidence in the wisdom of the course, Let them alone. Conversion by the ordinary modes of instruction and argument is precluded. Gratify them not with a few short days of that notoriety which they so much covet. Leave them to the natural influences of their system ; leave them to the silent disgust which their excesses must awaken in a community not absolutely savage ; leave them to the cant and priestcraft of a few ignorant and interested leaders ; and it is not perhaps entirely past all hope that, in this way, some of them may be so far reclaimed as to become ashamed of their cause, ashamed of one another, and ashamed of themselves.

Meanwhile let us hope that a better philosophy than the degrading sensualism, out of which most forms of modern infidelity have grown, will prevail; and that the minds of the rising generation will be thoroughly imbued with it. Let it be a philosophy which recognizes the higher nature of man, and aims in a chastened and reverential spirit to unfold the mysteries of his higher life. Let it be a philosophy which comprehends the soul, — a soul susceptible of religion, of the sublime principle of faith, of a faith which “entereth into that within the veil.” Let it be a philosophy which continually reminds us of our intimate relationship to the spiritual world; which opens to us new sources of strength in temptation, new sources of consolation in trouble, and new sources of life in death; nay, which teaches us that what we call death is but the dying of all that is mortal, that nothing but life may remain. Let it be a philosophy which prepares us to expect extraordinary manifestations of our heavenly Father’s love and care, and which harmonizes perfectly with the sublime moral purpose and meaning of the gospel, “casting down imaginations and every high thing that exalteth itself against the knowledge of God, and bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ.”

IV.

PROVIDENCE.

“Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered.” — MATTHEW X. 29, 30.

THESE words will suggest the subject of my discourse; namely, the immediate and universal providence of God.

At first sight we might presume that every sincere and earnest student of nature would devoutly recognize the Creator in his works. But distinguished names in the history of science will occur to every one, which remind us that it is not so; and there is a well-known principle of the human mind, which will help us to explain the fact. It is the business of the physical inquirer to trace phenomena to what are called the laws of nature, and there stop. This, in time, begets a habit of mind which controls not only his curiosity, but his associations; every phenomenon he beholds suggests the law which explains it, but nothing beyond the law. This habit of mind will also be very apt to affect his modes of expression, and all his scientific expositions; when he has referred an event to the laws of nature, he will think that he has gone as far as it is his province to go.

Now we have no right to say of such a person, that he is an atheist; we have no right even so much as to suspect that he has taken up and considered the theological question, and come to the conclusion that there is no God. The most that we have a right to say is, that the religious references in the case have dropped out of the chain of his associations. Still this alone is enough to show that, in one respect at least, the progress of science has been unfavorable to religious views of the universe. Formerly, when every unusual and startling phenomenon was referred directly to God, God seemed to be nearer to men than now; he was more on their lips, he was more in their thoughts, than now. These laws of nature, which are referred to so frequently, have to a certain extent usurped his place. "All things," we say, "take place according to the laws of nature;" as if nothing more was to be said about it; as if these laws were to be rested in as an efficient and ultimate cause; as if they could explain any thing, until they are themselves explained; as if they made the instant agency of the Deity any the less necessary;

without whom not a sparrow falleth to the ground.

What are these laws of nature, which are thus allowed to form themselves into a sort of cloudy screen between us and God? When we reason from adaptation to contrivance, and say that the world supposes a maker just as much as a watch, there is one point where the analogy fails. The watch-maker has the materials furnished to his hands. He does not make the laws of nature: he only makes use of them. He ascertains what these laws are; and, knowing this, he puts the parts of the mechanism together, and the laws of nature do the rest. Accordingly we may say with sufficient propriety that the watch goes by virtue of the laws of nature, and not by the continued agency of the man who made it. But in the making and sustaining of the world it is otherwise. God not only framed the stupendous mechanism of the universe, but created the materials, and impressed upon them their respective laws, so that each might perform its part in the vast whole. With the mere mechanic, mechanism is every thing; that is, the form, connection, and relative proportions of the parts: with God it is as nothing. He might have adopted a different mechanism, and still, by altering the laws of the parts relatively to each other, he might have brought about the same result. Every thing depends, therefore, on these laws; but what do the laws themselves depend upon? Are they any thing but the constant and immediate action of God on every particle of matter in the universe?

This is the conception which seems best to accord with the nature of things, and the facts to be explained; and accordingly it has been adopted not only by many divines and metaphysicians, but by some of the most earnest and single-minded of physical inquirers, with Sir Isaac Newton, himself a host, at their head. In the observations on the nature of the Deity, with which that wonderful man closes his "Optics," he declares that the various portions of the world, organic and inorganic, "can be the effect of nothing else than the wisdom and skill of a powerful, ever-living Agent; who, being in all places, is more able by his will to move the bodies within his boundless uniform sensorium, and thereby to form and reform the parts of the universe, than we are by our will to move the parts of our own bodies." This conviction would also seem to be gaining ground from the countenance it has received of late from several of the leading minds in the scientific world. Thus Sir John Herschel, after speaking of certain fixed qualities and powers with which God has impressed the materials of the universe, is careful to add: "We would in no way be understood to deny the constant exercise of his direct power in maintaining the system of nature, or the ultimate emanation of every energy which material agents exert from his immediate will, acting in conformity with its own laws."<sup>1</sup> Professor Whewell is still more explicit: "A law supposes an agent and a power; for it is the mode according to which the agent proceeds, the order according to which the power acts. Without the presence of such an agent, of such a power, conscious of the relations on which the law depends, producing the effects which the law prescribes, the law can have no efficacy, no existence. Hence we infer that the intelligence by which the law is ordained, the power by which it is put in action, must be present at all times and in all places where the effects of the power occur; that thus the knowledge and the agency of the Divine Being pervade every portion of the universe, producing all action and passion, all permanence and change."<sup>2</sup>

With such authorities in favor of this conception, I suppose I might take it for granted, and go on; but, as the subject is an important one, I am tempted to add a suggestion or two, which may help to familiarize minds unaccustomed to the subject with the idea, and dissipate half-formed objections and doubts.

The phrase, "laws of nature," is a figure of speech borrowed from human legislation; and, by pushing the analogy further than it will properly go, many slide into the belief that these laws were decreed once for all, like human laws, to exist and be in force ever afterwards of themselves. So it might have been, if, as in the case of human laws, there were minds to understand, remember, and apply them; but nothing like this is true of inert matter. "Yes, but cannot inert matter be made to obey them?" Certainly it can; and that is just what we are maintaining. We only say that our conceptions of matter will not allow us to suppose that it can make itself obey them. It can do nothing whatever of itself; it can move only as it is moved. All this holds good even of what are called the mechanical laws of matter: how much more clearly and manifestly of the countless forces of life and growth, which we cannot conceive of, even in thought, except as dependent on the Force of all forces, in and through which they exist and act! Here, as it seems to me, the reasoning of Dr. Clarke is conclusive. "Matter is evidently not capable of any laws or powers whatsoever, any more than it is capable of intelligence, excepting only this one negative power ; that every part of it will always and necessarily continue in that state, whether of rest or motion, wherein it at present is. So that all those things which we commonly say are the effects of the natural powers of matter and laws of motion, — of gravitation, attraction, or the like, — are indeed (if we will speak strictly and properly) the effects of God's acting upon matter continually and every moment, either immediately by himself, or mediately by some created intelligent being."

It is hardly to be expected that any one will revive the old Epicurean objection to this doctrine, that such continual overseeing and interfering must disturb the divine tranquillity. On the contrary, adopting the theory that the world was made in the beginning, and then wound up like a clock, and left to run on until it runs down, is it easy to repress the inquiry, What is the Creator doing meanwhile? According to the common acceptation, it is essential to spiritual natures to be knowing and active. If so, must we not believe that God, who is an Infinite Spirit, exists at every instant of time in every point of space, knowing and active? Can we separate from the common, from the only true and legitimate, from the only possible, conception of an Infinite Spirit the conviction that he is the universally diffused, all-sustaining, and all-directing Energy? I think not. Reasoning then from the nature of God, we come to the very same conclusion as in reasoning from the nature of matter. "The universe exists in God; and every change in its state, from the extinction of a system of worlds to the falling of a feather from a sparrow's wing, is his act." It would save many minds from much perplexity and embarrassment on this subject, if they would give over thinking to assign to the Infinite Spirit a local centre of thought and activity. If they must have a sensorium, let it be Newton's "boundless uniform sensorium." God, as it has been sublimely said, is a circle whose centre is everywhere, whose circumference is no where: "overseeing" and "interference," therefore, are words which in respect to him have no meaning.

Another objection to the religious view here taken of the divine agency, is sometimes insisted on by a different class of minds. It would detract, they think, from the skill of the Divine Architect, to suppose that in the fabric of the universe he has put together a piece of mechanism which requires mending or interposition of any sort. Undoubtedly it would, but nothing like this is said or intended. Here I might protest, if it were necessary, against this practice of drawing illustrations of the divine agency almost exclusively from the slight and inadequate analogy of mechanical contrivances ; but it is not. Let it be that the mechanism of the universe is perfect ; that it never wears out ; that it never needs readjustment. One thing, however, should be remembered : it is essential to the very idea of mechanism that a force be applied, — some weight, or spring, or other power which is continually acting upon it, and from which all its motions are derived. Now, in the case of the mechanism of the universe, where is this moving force to be found but in the universally diffused, all-directing, ever-active energy of God ?

But it may be asked again, is it not derogatory to the dignity of the Supreme Being, that he should “set his hand to every thing,” — even to things mean and unimportant ? This objection is as old as Aristotle. “If,” said he, “it were not congruous in respect of the state and majesty of Xerxes, the great king of Persia, that he should condescend to do all the meanest offices himself, much less can this be thought suitable in respect of God.” How paltry and insignificant do these distinctions of earthly pride appear, when viewed in relation to the divine presence and agency ! Who shall say what things are “mean and insignificant,” when it is considered that every link in the chain of events is alike indispensable to the mighty results which an all-wise Providence is slowly unfolding? Besides, what are differences of the finite to the Infinite? Grant that He stoops to take care of the solar system, and I find no difficulty in supposing that he also stoops to take care of man, of an insect, of a worm.

Accordingly I hold, that in the natural world the hand of God is everywhere in every thing, holding the sun in its place, and also the mote in the sun's beam: the volcano and the bursting flower equally announce his presence. We talk about laws and mechanisms and organisms; and no one can object to this, for such they are to our minds: but when we ask ourselves what they are in themselves, what gives life and force to the whole, the veil is lifted, and the constant and immediate agency of the Infinite Mind stands revealed. Suppose this all-sustaining, self-sustained agency to be withdrawn for an instant, and the law, and the mechanism, and the organism would cease to act, would cease to be; the universe itself rush back into its primitive nothingness. The error of the pantheists consists in identifying nature with God; the error of the mechanical philosophers consists in making nature independent of God, at least in its present existence and operation. Both errors are to be avoided; the latter as well as the former: otherwise we shall lose ourselves in the phenomena, the appearances, and make no account of the reality. It was not without reason that Newton "thought it most unaccountable to exclude the Deity only from the universe," — the Deity by whom it is upheld and filled. Speculations are going on at this moment respecting the nature of light, and the profound affinities of electricity and magnetism, and even life itself, which seem to point to laws of nature which transcend matter. We may presume that these will have a tendency to lead science to take a more spiritual and religious view of nature itself. The office of science will still be to trace phenomena to the laws of nature; but when to the eye of faith these laws are seen to resolve themselves into the direct agency and control of the Lord of Nature, instead of forming a cloudy screen between us and him, they will help us to feel and to know that everywhere and at all times we are in his immediate presence.

If this conception of the laws of nature be accepted as the true one, what need is there of a labored argument to prove an immediate and universal Providence without which not a sparrow falls to the ground? Nature itself is providence, and nothing but providence; its laws are not merely the work of God, they are God working; and, as we have seen before what the character of the Lord of Nature is, we may infer what the character of this providence must be.

But there are two or three points of view under which the doctrine of providence, as here unfolded, deserves and requires particular notice.

In the first place, when rightly understood and applied, it will banish for ever the thought of chance, accident, or fortune, as having nothing whatever to do with the course of events. And here the error is deeper and more widely spread than many are willing to suppose. As it has been justly said: "Some things look so like chance that we have difficulty in connecting them with the notion of Providence. We think the sparrow not formed by chance; we argue a Creator there: but by chance we think it may fly hither and thither. In human life many occurrences have a very fortuitous appearance. We cannot trace either their causes or their consequences. They are as the tree which, we say, happened to fall in one direction and not in another. They are as the wind which, we also say, happened to blow from one point of the compass yesterday, and from another to-day." "Our language is framed on the supposition of a mingling of accident with order, of chance with design. It is framed on a false supposition. We are often aware of this on reflection; and yet we are so familiarized with such language, that we perhaps unconsciously delude our own minds by its use, and keep up a notion of the incompatibility of a Providence with the particular events so described." <sup>1</sup>

Looking back on the past history of mankind, it is easy to see that two opposite tendencies have been at work, at different stages in the development of human thought, to impair or dim the doctrine of a strictly immediate and universal Providence. At first men saw the hand of God only in strange and startling phenomena, — in the whirlwind, the lightning, the earthquake. Afterwards, as these also fell, one after another, under the domain of order and law, and were explained and accounted for by science on mechanical principles, men began to see design in the whole, but not the instant and constant presence and influence of the Designer in the whole and in every part. Now we must not expect that science will go back: this would be to contradict and falsify the experience of ages and the nature of truth itself. Let science go on, and demonstrate that every thing is ordered. It is not by chance that a bird flies hither or thither; the tree does not happen to fall, or the wind to blow, this way or that: all is ordered. But we must go one step further. We must enter into the sublime conception, that the life and soul of this order, the all-sustaining, ever-active, energy without which the whole would be nothing, without which not a leaf in the forest stirs, is God.

Again, it has been customary to lay a good deal of stress on the distinction between a General Providence and a Particular Providence, especially as regards the efficacy of prayer: but in the doctrine here maintained of an immediate and universal Providence, this distinction disappears, and with it many difficulties both speculative and practical.

If by a general providence nothing more is meant than the general provision which God has made for mankind in the laws and constitution of nature, as framed by him in the beginning and set in motion, to go on afterwards of itself, — I can easily see that this view of Providence cannot and ought not to satisfy the longings of the soul. If this were all, man would feel himself to be standing amidst the play of a vast and complicated machinery, which is working out his destiny and that of all other beings, — it knows not, and it cares not, how or why. Should he pray, it must be on the ground that he himself and his prayers make a part of the machinery just mentioned, which was foreseen and provided for when the whole was first put together. But with what heart, with what truth or naturalness of feeling, could he utter his supplications, if he believed that the prayer he is making now was granted or denied six thousand years ago?

Not satisfied with this, the religiously disposed have turned instinctively to a particular providence. But here again we meet with difficulty. If by a particular providence is meant a special interposition of the Deity; if it is meant that God occasionally breaks into the course of nature, and acts directly and immediately, when otherwise he would not act at all, — it supposes a violent change in the mode of the divine agency in favor of the individual, which those who most deserve it would have too much humility to expect; or, if they did, I am afraid its effect on their humility and on their whole character would be any thing but good. There is much force in a remark of Dr. Brown: “There are many minds, perhaps the greatest number, in which the constant habit of ascribing every little beneficial event to some interposition of the Divine Power in their particular favor, tends to cherish a sort of isolating selfishness, which, in its own peculiar relation to events that are supposed to be out of the common course of things, almost loses the comprehensive and far more important relation of Nature to the whole human race.”<sup>1</sup>

apply. As it is absolutely universal, its tendency cannot be, like that of a belief in special interpositions, to nourish an egotistic or clannish spirit, under the impression that God is our God in a way in which he is not the God of all mankind. At the same time, as it is immediate, it entirely meets and satisfies that want of the soul out of which, as we have seen, the doctrine of a particular and special providence arose. It opens the way by which every individual soul can be brought into instant and immediate communion with the Living God. We no longer feel ourselves to be standing amidst the play of a vast and complicated machinery which is doing it knows not what: every motion, every breath around us proclaims the instant presence and instant action of the Divinity. You kneel beside the pallid and wasted form of one whose malady baffles all human skill, and pray that his life may yet be spared. You feel, you know, that you are not speaking into the air: you feel, you know, that the event is still in the hands of one who is acting now, who acts consciously and freely, who hears every word you say. That any remedy has any effect whatever is wholly owing to the conscious and instant agency of God; and what that effect shall be in any particular instance will depend on the law which his unerring Wisdom prescribes at the time to his Omnipotent Will.

There is also another aspect under which this doctrine recommends itself, at least to Christians; it scatters to the winds the common philosophical objections to the credibility of miracles. A miracle has been variously defined by Christian writers. Sometimes it has been made to be "a violation of the laws of nature;" sometimes, "an extraordinary effect of an extraordinary cause," God acting immediately in this case, and in this case only, as "one of the powers of nature." But some minds find a difficulty in believing that there is, or can be, any thing like violation or interposition in the laws of nature, or the providence of God. Understand, then, that all events, common as well as miraculous, are caused by the constant and immediate agency of Divine Power: in this respect there is no difference; one is no more of the nature of an interposition than the other. Understand, likewise, that what we call "the laws of nature" are nothing but the uniformity of the divine action; and again, that God observes this uniformity as a general rule, not on account of any thing in the uniformity itself, but simply and solely because he sees, in each particular instance, that it is best for his creatures. The law of his own nature, the law of infinite wisdom and goodness, moves him to do, in each particular instance, what he sees to be best for his creatures: this is the only law which has any thing to do with the divine conduct. Suppose now an exigency to arise (as in the case of the first promulgation of the gospel), when it is manifestly best for his creatures that he should deviate from his customary uniformity of action, — do you not perceive that in this case all the reasons and all the law which move him at other times to observe this uniformity, must move him now to depart from it? The miracle, therefore, is not a violation of the only law on which the uniformity of nature depends, but necessary to its fulfilment.

To the Christian, therefore, I repeat it, this view of nature and providence must recommend itself, because it takes from the miraculous evidence, on which in part at least his faith must rest, the anomalous character it has sometimes been made to wear. A real miracle is not of the nature of an interposition, neither is it a violation of the law of the Divine Nature. All events are what they are, through the constant and instant action of the Divinity; and, if in any case they deviate from the customary uniformity of nature, it is only because it is necessary to the immutability of God; for this immutability, as every one must perceive, does not consist in his acting in the same way under an essential change of circumstances, but in his acting in all circumstances from the same eternal principle of love. It must, also, recommend itself to Christians as being what the Saviour and his apostles taught. The doctrine of Providence, which I have been endeavoring though feebly and inadequately to set forth, is pre-eminently the Christian doctrine. "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. But the very hairs of your head are all numbered." "Of Him, and through Him, and to Him are all things." "In Him we live, and move, and have our being."

Thus far I have spoken of the providence which God exercises over the material world, over nature, and over man only in so far as he is related to nature and influenced by it. But it would hardly do to pass from this subject without saying a few words on what is at once the most interesting and the most difficult part: I mean the providence which God exercises over the spiritual world, over minds.

Here there is a marked difference growing out of the essential distinction between matter and spirit. The distinguishing characteristic of matter is inertia: it moves only as it is moved; it acts only as it is acted on. The distinguishing characteristic of spirit is self-activity: it moves itself; it is a free cause. Herein, perhaps, more than in any thing else, man resembles his Creator; he is, in short, a kind of limited and dependent creator: he creates his own volitions; he can begin a new series of events. God has seen fit to invest him with a freedom which he himself respects: hence man's responsibility, glory, peril. The planets are not free to move in their orbits, or not; the flowers of the field are not free to expand their leaves and diffuse their fragrance, or not; even the animals are not free to follow out, or not, those mysterious instincts which have been wrought into their organization, as a kind of vision or dream. But man — the soul — is free; free to do or not to do; to obey or disobey, to yield to or resist even divine influences and suggestions.

Here, as I have said, is a remarkable peculiarity; how is it provided for? As Dr. Price observes: "It would be denying the doctrine of Providence entirely, and making the universe in a manner forlorn and fatherless, to suppose that all that the Deity does, is to endow beings with powers and affections, and then to turn them out into a wide theatre, there to scuffle as they can, and do what they please, without taking any care of them, or presiding over their affairs. We cannot be more sure of the moral perfections of the Deity, than we are that this is false."<sup>1</sup> But man's condition in this world would not be very different from that which is here described, if God's providence extends no further than to his outward circumstances, leaving him to be affected by them as he may. Indeed, on the most general grounds, I cannot divest myself of the conviction, that the Infinite Spirit must act in and through his spiritual creation, by virtue of an intimacy far more profound than any which does or can exist between him and unconscious nature. Then, too, the inward experiences of every man that lives, — the sense of dependence, the instinct of prayer, the effort to raise himself above himself, the aspiration after the perfect and the infinite, — what are these but so many intimations that we were made to be sustained and filled by a strength and a light which are not our own? That this doctrine springs up naturally in a pious and thoughtful mind, even without the aid of revelation, appears from the following statement of it, as given by one of the most spiritually minded of the ancient sages: "Let your soul receive the Deity as your blood does the air; for the influences of the one are no less vital than the other. This correspondence is practicable; for there is an ambient, omnipresent Spirit, which lies as open and pervious to your mind as the air you breathe does to your lungs. But then you must remember to be disposed to draw it."

Provision is here made as well for the freedom

as for the frailty of man. God does not break into the soul against its will, or without its consent: the most that he does is, in the expressive language of Scripture, to "stand at the door and knock." Man can open his soul by holy exercises, by humility, by prayer, by love; or he can keep it shut. God is everywhere present and everywhere active in nature; we cannot help being surrounded at all times by the universally diffused light and energy. Not only good men, but bad men, the worst of men, are immersed, if I may so express it, in the Divine Presence: still the rebel spirit can keep himself utterly false and dark. The reason is, that this Presence finds entrance into the soul only in so far as the soul is brought into harmony with it, or humbles itself before it.

This I suppose to be the philosophical basis of the Christian doctrine of Divine Influences. Of course it is not pretended that there is any thing supernatural or miraculous in the ordinary influences of the Spirit. They result from the constitution of things as determined by the Creator; and, so far as we are concerned, they appear to result from that constitution according to general and fixed laws. They are not arbitrarily bestowed; they are not offered to one, and not to another, on any principle of partiality or selection. They are offered to all, — absolutely to all; and they can be, and are, made available by all of every kindred and tongue, of every faith and worship, just in proportion as by holy exercises, by love, by self-surrender, by humility and prayer, they put themselves into a condition to receive the needed Presence. Still, there would seem to be no good reason why an attempt should be made, from fear of extravagance and fanaticism, to confound the ordinary influences of the Spirit with the operations of our own minds. We cannot be reminded too often that under paganism, and also under Christianity, the most debasing and revolting forms of extravagance and fanaticism have prevailed among the ignorant, precisely at those times when a cold, sceptical, and rationalizing spirit found most favor among the better informed. This Divine Presence, this spiritual and heavenly succor, is shed abroad in our hearts as an influx of light and peace and joy, — a confidence, an energy, an impulse ; and hence it is not to be regarded as mental action of our own, but rather as the foundation of a better and higher mental action of our own. Even Cicero could say, “there never was a truly great man without divine inspiration.” In one word, what we mean is simply this : as a man may be filled with the spirit of selfishness, and in this case will act from selfish influences ; or, with the spirit of the world, and in this case will act from worldly influences, — so may he also, in the same proportion as he makes himself like God, or humbles himself unreservedly before him, be filled with the Spirit of God; and in this case he will act from Divine influences.

I meant to say something of the place which prayer holds in this view of the providence which God exercises over the spiritual world; but I forbear. When we undertake to reason about what does not belong to the reasoning faculties, but to the affections, we soon find ourselves involved in inextricable difficulties. It is not that the thing itself is not reasonable: we feel that it is reasonable; but we feel, at the same time, that it is not a matter of reasoning. And the difficulty is complicated still further, when what we have to consider not only belongs to the affections, but is a spontaneous tribute of those affections. The moral and religious affections are in themselves essentially disinterested; and of course what they do and say is essentially untranslatable into the language of selfishness. Thus it is, as a general rule, that the heart alone can understand itself, and the reasonableness and the profit of its own offerings. To be able therefore to answer the question, What profit is there in prayer? we must enter into its spirit; and, as soon as we do enter into its spirit, we shall cease to take much interest in the question.

Time also fails me to speak as I should of the spiritual discernment, and earnest and living faith, imparted to those in whom the Spirit of God dwells. A foreign writer has said of that great light which has lately gone down among us: "All true light he regarded as proceeding from the higher sentiments of the soul, receiving and manifesting God's spirit. To keep his own nature pure, reverential, loving, unstained by the passions, unsullied by appetite and sense, so that God might find it ready for his impulses, and be able to breathe his Holy Spirit through it, — this he regarded as the highest and surest preparation for the reception of Spiritual Truth. And the sense proceeding to him from such states, of the goodness of God, of the destination and true happiness of man, of an all-embracing love as the only principle of a beneficent connection with one another, or with the universe; of the blessedness of obeying conscience; of the sure triumph and eternal vindication of Righteousness and Mercy, — was not to him a mere human or fallible impression, but the solemn affirmation of Almighty God." <sup>1</sup>

If what I have now said is true, God is really present and active throughout nature and in all good men, in a sense and to a degree much beyond what the common opinion, or the common speech, seems to recognize. The promise of philosophy has always been to give us back the simplicity of wisdom as a substitute for the simplicity of ignorance, which it has taken away ; to give us back simplicity of life, simplicity of manners, simplicity of faith. May we not hope that it will make this promise good ? The child listens to the thunder as the voice of God ; the savage listens to the sighings of the wind through the primeval forests as the breathing of the Great Spirit. Both are right, according to their apprehension of things. Philosophy, a devout and Christian philosophy, would only extend this solemn and awful recognition of the Divine Presence, and “ see God in every thing, and every thing in God.”

V.

SPIRITUAL DEATH.

"I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead." — REVELATION iii. 1.

SINNERS, in whom the better principles of human nature are entirely overpowered by evil habit, are said in Scripture and elsewhere to be spiritually dead. I purpose to speak, in this discourse, of the nature, the causes, and the remedy of spiritual death.

In speaking of this state, let us take care, in the first place, never to mistake for spiritual death what is not that, though it may resemble it in some respects. There are those, everybody knows, who are constitutionally cold and phlegmatic, — cold and phlegmatic in every thing, — who are never excited, who are never warm. Look at them in all their relations; follow them into all their occupations. They are not ardent in their friendships or their enmities, or in the pursuit of knowledge, or of gain, or of pleasure. Now it would be preposterior to expect such persons to be otherwise than phlegmatic in religion, when compared with Christians of a more sanguine temperament. And yet, they are not spiritually dead. They are as much alive to religion as they are to any thing. Besides, there is nothing in their constitutional coldness and phlegm to hinder them from acting habitually on religious principles; or from being swayed on the whole by a religious spirit: which is all that is absolutely indispensable to a religious life. It is true, they are not likely to have enough of earnestness and devotion, to counteract strong antagonist feelings; but then, it is also true of the persons now under consideration, that by the very constitution of their nature they do not have strong antagonist feelings to be counteracted. They may be said, therefore, to require — they can get along with — less intensity of religious feeling than other people, because in them the passions, propensities which are apt to come into conflict with religious feelings, are also proportionably less intense. And what say the Scriptures? “Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.” Here you will observe, that the abstract amount of affection required is not stated; one fixed and absolute standard is not set up for all persons; it is not said, with precisely how much heart, soul, mind, and strength we must love the Lord our God: it is enough if we love him, each one with all the heart, and soul, and mind, and strength that he has.

Again, we must not mistake for spiritual death that outward reserve on religious subjects, which sometimes springs from the very intensity of the feelings, or at least from an extreme and morbid delicacy of the feelings. Our Lord says, it is true, "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. A good man, out of the good treasure of his heart, bringeth forth good things; and an evil man, out of the evil treasure, bringeth forth evil things." That is, a man's conversation, if he says any thing, will be likely to be pure or impure, according to the predominant bias of his affections and inclinations. But it is by no means asserted or implied here, and it is by no means in accordance with experience and observation, that those men are always the most talkative whose hearts are the fullest. The direct contrary to this would be nearer the truth. As a general rule, people everywhere hesitate to say much, or to speak freely, about their deepest and most delicate feelings: partly from a difficulty to find words adequate to express them; partly from a fear that they will not meet with a hearty sympathy in other minds; and partly from an almost invincible repugnance to lay bare to vulgar gaze the mysteries of the inner man. Occasionally you may meet with those who are fond of talking about their religious experiences; and it is not for me, or for you, to judge, or even to call in question, their sincerity, or the reality of their experiences. But this we think we may say: with sensible people, the indications of suppressed feeling weigh more, a thousand times more, as evidence of real and deep emotion, than having the same feeling uttered and exaggerated.

But surely I need not labor this point. As some men are constitutionally cold and phlegmatic, so others, who are far from being cold and phlegmatic, are yet constitutionally reserved and uncommunicative, — reserved and uncommunicative in matters of business, as well as in the things of the Spirit. Now I do not say that this habitual reserve, this indisposition to free communion of thought and feeling on religious subjects, cannot be carried too far. I do not say that it never amounts to a fault. On the contrary, I believe that it is often a very great fault, and that Christianity has suffered as much from this fault in its enlightened friends, as from almost any other. Still I maintain, and after what has been said I hope it is sufficiently obvious, that outward reserve as regards religion is not in itself, and does not of itself, necessarily argue or imply spiritual death.

What, then, is spiritual death? It consists in the absence of that sensibility of soul by which men are made capable of feeling and appreciating spiritual things. Sometimes this arises from the fact that the spiritual element in our nature has never been excited and developed; the man has never been spiritually born. But it is more frequently owing to a torpor or palsy which, from some cause, comes over the spiritual faculties after their partial development, to such a degree as, in some instances, entirely to destroy and suspend their vital and legitimate functions. He still is alive to other things,—alive, and perhaps intensely alive, to the pleasures of sense, to the pursuits of gain, to a love of power and fame; to every thing, in short, which does not involve the presence and activity of the moral and spiritual faculties: but so far as these are concerned he is dead. When we say that a man is spiritually dead, we do not mean that his body is dead; nay, we do not mean that his mind is dead, so far as it is capable of being occupied exclusively on things of time, and sense, and self. He may even be eminent as a mathematician, or naturalist, or statesman; and yet as regards all those feelings and exercises which involve the consciousness and the agency of his higher nature, and his relations to the spiritual world, he may be as dead as the drunken vagabond about the streets.

This, then, is what we understand by spiritual death. Not a general and constitutional coldness in regard to all things, but a particular deadness and insensibility to every thing which is addressed to our spiritual nature; not a mere outward reserve, but a torpor and palsy of the spiritual faculties.

The Scriptures sometimes represent this under the figure of a "second death;" for as there is a second birth, indicating that the body is born at one time and the spirit at another, so also is there a second death, indicating in like manner that the body may die at one time and the spirit at another. But there is this difference: though the spirit is never born first, it may die first, so far at least as it is susceptible of death. So far, I say, so far as it is susceptible of death; for we must not urge the language of Scripture, or this analogy between the death of the body and the death of the spirit, too far. The death of the body is an utter and final dissolution of the body; but the death of the spirit is nothing more, strictly speaking, than the inaction and temporary suspension of faculties which are in their own nature indestructible. Nay, it does not follow, because the soul is dead to every thing which constitutes its proper life, that it is dead to the want and misery occasioned by what may justly be termed a living death. However this may be, it is certain that the soul, so far as it can die, may die before the body ; that causes may now be in operation to destroy the proper life of the soul, and that the individual himself may voluntarily contribute to this effect, to his own spiritual self-destruction. It is, indeed, an appalling thought, that, where there is one suicide of the body, there are probably twenty, may I not say a hundred, suicides of the soul.

Let us now advert briefly to some of the causes conspiring to induce that indifference and insensibility to spiritual things, which constitutes, as we have seen, spiritual death.

And first, I would say, that less is to be feared, in this connection, from erroneous than from lifeless training. A writer, of whom our country and the age may justly boast, has said: "I do not think that so much harm is done by giving error to a child, as by giving truth in a lifeless form. What is the misery of the multitudes in Christian countries? Not that they disbelieve Christianity, or that they hold great errors, but that truth lies dead within them. They use the most sacred words without meaning. They hear of spiritual realities, awful enough to raise the dead, with utter unconcern ; and one reason of this insensibility is, that teaching in early life was so mechanical, that religion was lodged in the memory and the unthinking belief, whilst the reason was not awakened, nor the conscience nor the heart moved. According to the common modes of instruction, the minds of the young become worn to great truths. By reading the Scriptures without thought or feeling, their minds are dulled to their most touching and sublime passages; and, when once a passage lies dead in the mind, its resurrection to life and power is a most difficult work.”<sup>1</sup>

A kindred thought was presented long ago, by Dr. Priestley, in a sermon on “The Danger of Bad Habits,” — cold and philosophical throughout in manner, yet one of the most solemn appeals ever made to the conscience; the object being to prove that to many the day of judgment may be said to come before the day of their death. “A person,” he observes, “who has studied, or who fancies he has studied, any particular subject, sooner or later makes up his mind, as we say, with respect to it; and, after this, all arguments intended to convince him of his mistake, only serve to confirm him in his chosen way of thinking. An argument or evidence of any kind, that is entirely new to a man, may make a proper impression upon him; but if it has often been proposed to him, and he has had time to view and consider it, so as to have hit upon any method of evading the power of it, he is afterwards quite callous to it, and can very seldom be prevailed upon to give it any proper attention. This consideration accounts, in some measure, both for the great influence of Christianity on its first publication, when the doctrines were new and striking, and also for the absolute indifference with which the same great truths are now heard in all Christian countries.”<sup>1</sup>

It is high time that all, and that intelligent Christians especially, should wake up to the importance of these suggestions. We are for ever extolling the power of truth, the value of sound and just views, and a rational and consistent faith; and all this is well, provided the whole be instinct with a living spirit. But of what avail will be the truth itself, if held, I do not say “in unrighteousness,” but in indifference and apathy? We have, I know, the warrant of Scripture for believing that it is the truth by which men are to be sanctified and made free; but who has yet to learn that the truth which is to do this, is not truth contemplated as an abstraction, truth set forth in propositions, truth locked up in creeds? It is living truth. It is truth in action, truth considered as wrought into the very life, the truth which we live from day to day. But that this sort of truth may be dispensed, it is necessary that both preacher and hearer should reproduce it, each one in his own mind and heart. It is not enough that we receive it passively as a tradition, or adopt it passively on authority ; we must make it matter of inward experience, of spiritual consciousness, and thus reproduce it, as it were, in our own minds and hearts. And in this way, let me observe in passing, the oldest truths may again become as fresh and new to us, individually and personally, as when they first fell from the lips of the Great Teacher.

Give us the living truth ; but, if we cannot have that, give us, in God's name, living error. As liberal Christians we are, beyond question, over-critical and fastidious in this matter. It may not be so with other denominations, but our chief danger grows out of an under current that is continually setting towards a dead rationalism. Give us, I repeat it, living error, rather than dead truth ; for the same maxim holds good in regard to our higher as well as our lower nature : "so long as there is life, there is hope." Besides, do we not know that a ship under sail, though a little off from its course, can get into it again in half the time it will take another vessel at anchor under a headland, or waterlogged in a calm, to get under way?

Again, so far as religious indifference and insensibility are concerned, there is less to fear, as it seems to me, from the influence of an avowed and active scepticism than from the influence of a scepticism which is unacknowledged and merely passive. Well and truly was it said by Archbishop Leighton: "Where there is a great deal of smoke, and no clear flame, it argues much moisture in the matter, yet it witnesseth certainly that there is fire there; and therefore dubious questioning is a much better evidence than that senseless deadness which most take for believing. Men that know nothing in sciences have no doubts. He never truly believes who was not made first sensible, and convinced of his unbelief. Never be afraid to doubt, if only you have the disposition to believe, and doubt in order that you may end in believing the truth."<sup>1</sup> If we must have an active or a passive scepticism, give us the first. An active scepticism will often cure itself, work itself clear of its difficulties; but there is no hope whatever for a man who will neither believe nor inquire. An active scepticism, moreover, does not imply an indifference to truth, nor prevent men from discriminating; so that, while it leads them to deny this thing and doubt that, it leaves their confidence in other things unimpaired, and perhaps strengthened and quickened. But it is of the nature of a latent and passive scepticism, by confounding the true with the false, and the certain with the doubtful, to spread itself gradually over the whole subject, involving natural as well as revealed religion in the same doubt, and causing them to be regarded with a like indifference. Under the influence of this spirit, the best that men can be expected to do is to settle down at last into the conceited and supercilious conclusion, that Christianity, whether true or not, is a good thing for society, and especially for the lower classes, and must not be disturbed.<sup>1</sup>

Yes, I earnestly contend that any thing is better than that senseless deadness here referred to, which sometimes passes for believing. Accordingly I do not participate, to any considerable degree, in the regret or alarm expressed by some at the tendency of modern scepticism to come forth into the light of day, and to put on a form of light and activity corresponding to the magnitude of the principles at stake. It is no evidence that scepticism and infidelity are on the increase: both have always existed to an extent far beyond what is generally supposed; but it is the consequence of that spirit which is abroad, leading men to sift all subjects to the bottom, and religion among the rest, with a determination to find whether it is founded in reality or not. And I, for one, welcome the change. Indeed, when I see deists, like Lord Herbert, praying on their bended knees that God would give them a sign from heaven to end their doubts; when I see atheists shedding bitter tears over the conscious desolation which want of faith has brought on their whole inward being,—though the iron has entered into their souls, I feel that still, while there is pain, there is life; and, while there is life, there is hope. Nay, I am almost tempted, under such circumstances, to pronounce a living scepticism better than a dead faith, as doing more to agitate and wake up a man's moral nature, to make him alive to the deep wants of his soul, and thus to put him into a condition to be affected and impressed by exhibitions of divine truth, from whatever quarter they may come. And I am much mistaken if it does not appear in the end, that the design, the final cause, in the providence of God, of the recent development of what are called the sceptical tendencies of the age, is to purify, by means of a reaction, the dull, close, and suffocating atmosphere in which, to so great an extent, the selfishness and the worldliness, and the low and earthly utilitarianism of the times, have wrapped so large a portion of the Church. If there is no other way of regenerating nominal Christianity, — if there is no other way of raising men out of this state of passive, latent, unacknowledged scepticism, which is doing so much, gradually and insidiously, to waste away the heart and moral life of humanity, but by passing through a process of active scepticism, — I, for one, welcome the ordeal. And, under the sway of a God of omnipotence and truth, I have no more fear that religion itself is to go down, than I have that civilization is again to be engulfed in barbarism, or that the wild beasts of the desert will rise on mankind, and depopulate the earth.

Once more, I need say but a word in illustration of what you all know, that sin, under any and all its thousand forms, leads to spiritual death. But it may be of more importance to observe here, that less perhaps is to be apprehended, so far as indifference and utter insensibility are concerned, from open, flagrant, and passionate crime, than from that worldliness and self-seeking which finds but little difficulty in disguising itself under a decent exterior, and keeping on good terms with itself and with society. Fanatics, as you are aware, have sometimes said that thieves and drunkards are nearer the Kingdom of Heaven than merely moral men; and there is just enough of truth in this statement to give currency in some circles to the radical and pestilent error it conveys. It is true, beyond all doubt, that the man who has killed within himself the principle of virtue, without having cast off its most indispensable outward forms, or adopted those of gross vice, is less likely to be startled in his downward course, is less likely to awake to the imminent peril of his situation, than one whose every-day scenes and every-day actions are of a nature to bring up before him visions of hell.

Moreover, it is not enough considered that mere levity and frivolity may superinduce an impenetrable callousness upon the human heart; and in time, through the power of habit, may render it absolutely unimpressible by the weightiest and most interesting objects in the universe. And what shall I say of sensuality? "She that liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth." Self-surrender to the animal passions, — it is the grave of every thing that is pure, and noble, and good; converting man, by a sort of living metempsychosis, into the beast in whose tastes and propensities he grovels. Neither does the curse stop with the torpor and palsy of the soul, but pursues him at last, under the form of a sated appetite and a withered heart, even into all his forbidden indulgences. Who has yet to learn that there are none who in effect extract so little happiness from pleasure as those who look to it as their sole or their highest gratification? Excess blunts every faculty and every sense until the man of pleasure becomes as dead to animal as to spiritual enjoyment; as dead to pleasure and the world as he is to religion and to God.

But it is time to conclude. You will remember that spiritual death is not absolute death. It is but the inaction or suspension of faculties which are in their own nature indestructible. Under the government and providence of our Heavenly Father, and with the powerful aids and appliances of a spiritual faith and worship, despair is unpardonable sin, — despair either for ourselves or for others. It is only necessary that we should be apprized of our danger, and avail ourselves of the means of resuscitating or waking up our moral and spiritual nature. Evoke its latent energies, and put them forth in deeds of philanthropy and mercy; commune with your own soul, and stand in awe of its mysterious revelations of the unseen and the infinite; study the lives and cultivate the society of those whose faith and piety at once excite and attract all who come within the sphere of their influence; resort as you may be able, and as you feel yourselves prepared, to earnest, heartfelt prayer, in which man is said, by a most expressive figure, to wrestle with God. Above all, have faith in him, at whose powerful word the grave gave up its dead; have faith in him that he can also work the kindred miracle of raising your soul from the death of sin to the life of righteousness. Wherefore it is said, — and their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world, — “Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life!”

MEANS OF STRENGTHENING AN INFIRM FAITH.

“ And straightway the father of the child cried out, and said with tears Lord, I believe : help thou mine unbelief! ” — MARK IX. 24.

THE state of mind which the Evangelist ascribes to the father of the lunatic child is not uncommon. It is the condition of one who has faith; but yet is conscious at times of doubts by which his faith is weakened and disturbed.

Such being the condition of many minds, perhaps of most thinking minds, it may be well to inquire how this temptation or tendency to doubt may be prevented. In other words, What are some of the best means of strengthening an unsettled or infirm faith?

First of all, we should eradicate from our minds what may be called the conceit of scepticism.

I do not suppose that all the scepticism in the world originates in one cause, or in causes all of which imply guilt. Something, doubtless, depends on organization; something also on education.

society, public opinion, and other extraneous influences for which the individual is, at most, but in part responsible. Still I cannot help suspecting that a principal consideration which reconciles many to being sceptical is the thought, that it argues more than usual strength or activity of mind ; that it is because they can see through what others cannot, and so are made less easy to be convinced. Whatever may be said of their doubts in a moral and religious point of view, they are fain to look upon them as the sign, perhaps as the penalty, of intellectual superiority.

But is this conceit well founded ? I allow that doubting is commonly the result of thinking ; but not of successful thinking : it is the result of baffled thinking ; and is baffled thinking a sign of intellectual power ? Again, the objections to a doctrine are generally obvious, palpable, on the outside, — anybody can understand them ; while the answers, for the most part, lie deeper, and so require more information, or greater reach of mind, in order to be appreciated, in order that their full force may be felt. For this reason, in a community where it is the fashion for all to think for themselves, no small portion of the actual scepticism, secret or avowed, may be referred to the single circumstance, that multitudes have enough of intelligence to understand the objection, but not enough to understand the answer. Certainly, therefore, it is not true of all scepticism, that it supposes mental superiority.

Furthermore, a propensity to scepticism does not betoken the best style or cast of mind. Minds may be divided into two classes: some are constructive, others destructive; some apt to discover analogies and harmonies, others quick to detect defects or discrepancies; some always trying to build up, others always trying to pull down. Now I suppose that most persons will go along with me when I say, that the first mentioned sort of mind is on every account to be preferred; yet the sceptically disposed belong to the last. I might illustrate and confirm what I mean from history. Compare Socrates with the sophists of his day; compare Bacon with Bayle; compare Locke with Hume; compare Newton with Laplace. I have no wish to detract aught from the acknowledged eminence of the last named in these several comparisons, as regards what fell in with the peculiar bent of their genius. If acuteness and subtilty of intellect, if a power to analyze and dissect, to criticise and find fault and pull to pieces, were all that is required, some of the great sceptics might be set down, I suppose, as second to none. Unquestionably these men stand among the highest in the order to which they belong, but the order itself is not the highest. The habit of attending to minute distinctions and mere details unfits them more and more for making up a confident opinion respecting any large and complicated subject. They belong to a class of ingenious persons, who are for ever liable to be ensnared by their own ingenuity. They are so ready with their difficulties and objections as to be more than a match even for themselves; and hence their scepticism.

Again, therefore, I say, let no one hug his scepticism, or entertain it with complacency, from a conceit that it is the price he has to pay for his intellectual superiority. So far is this from being the case, that in a large majority of instances scepticism is the sign of nothing but a limited and baffled understanding; and, even when it must be admitted to pertain to extraordinary powers, they are still, for the most part, the powers of a subtle and captious mind, but not those of a large, generous, comprehensive, and effective mind. Exceptions there may be; but the general rule is as I have said. A man is not great because he can see difficulties, but because he can see through difficulties; or, because he believes in what makes difficulties of no account, so that he can go on as if they did not exist. Accordingly we find that those who have been looked up to in all ages as lights and guides, — the great discoverers and in-

Having thus discarded every vestige of the conceit of scepticism, the next rule to be observed by those who would cure themselves of a tendency to unsettled opinions, in morals and religion, is to abstain from dwelling unduly on the difficult and perplexing aspects of the subject.

Every subject has its difficult and perplexing aspects. Take the simplest fact in Nature; consider it in all its connections and relations, and it will be found to run out into questions which all the triumphs of modern science leave as much in the dark as ever. Now where will you stop? Most persons, however sceptically inclined, would be willing to say, I suppose, that they should be content if they had as good evidence for the existence of the soul, as they have for that of the body; or as good evidence for the existence of the spiritual world, as they have for that of the material world. Yet, even in respect to the body and the material world, doubts and difficulties have been raised which have made the strongest minds waver; nay, books have been written, in all seriousness and good faith, to demonstrate not only their non-existence, but their impossibility. And so in morals. Few things, I suppose, are clearer to the great bulk of mankind, or more universally recognized, than the great primary distinctions of right and wrong. Here again, however, uneasy and distrustful minds may push their questionings into that perplexing field of inquiry which has to do with hereditary biases, differences of organization, and the power of circumstances, or with the insolvable mystery of the Divine prescience and human free agency, until what before was as clear as noon-day becomes hopelessly obscured and confused; until they are ready to doubt whether there is any such thing as proper responsibility, whether conscience, after all, is not an empty name, or at best an unauthorized prejudice, — a mere figment of the brain. Thus, by dwelling exclusively on the difficult side of things, a man may lose all confidence even in what the world, whether infidel or not on the subject of religion, have agreed to set down among the best established conclusions of sense and reason. How it is that such a result should follow from such a course is easy of explanation. By dwelling on the difficult and perplexing aspects of any subject, the mind is continually exposed to a twofold cause of mistake. In the first place, the points of objection and difference may be very few, compared with the points of general consent; still, if we give a great deal more attention and thought to the former than to the latter, we shall be tempted to believe that the proportion is reversed. Besides, the practical effect of objections to any doctrine depends much less on their number or weight than on the place we give them in our thoughts; on the amount of attention we pay to them. If, in other words, we think of them and nothing else, then it is plain that we shall know nothing about the subject but its difficulties and objections, and we shall be doubters as a matter of course. The law is, that our minds are affected by what is present to them, and not by what is absent from them, whether it exists or not. This law manifests itself in many things which have nothing to do with morals or religion. For example: we almost always over estimate the merits of our friends, and under estimate the merits of our enemies. Why? The reason is, that in thinking of our friends we are apt to think only of their virtues, while in thinking of our enemies we are apt to think only of their defects and faults. Here, too, we find the origin of much that goes under the name of party rancor, with all its meannesses and injustice, and particularly its disposition to impeach the motives or question the sincerity of opponents. Wonder is often expressed that really good men, in proportion as they become zealous partisans, are so ready to lend themselves to these abuses; but it is only another application of the above-mentioned law. When they think of their own party, they are apt to think of its good side only, but when they think of the party opposed to them, they are apt to think of its bad side only; and, doing so, the effect of this on their own minds is just the same as if their party really had no bad side, and the other no good side.

So likewise in respect to Christianity. If we never recur to it except to dwell on its difficulties and perplexities, and on the dark side of its history, it is plain that the effect on our minds will be the same as if these constituted the whole of Christianity. Christianity has a multitude of other aspects which recommend it immediately and irresistibly to the reason and the heart; but these are nothing to one who will not think on them, or, which is the same in effect, allows his mind to be wholly taken up with the difficult and perplexing aspects of the subject.

What makes it worse in the case of Christianity is, that, when persons fall into doubt respecting it, they naturally turn to books on the evidences, and the burden of these books is still the difficulties and perplexities. Considering what these books are intended for, it cannot be otherwise; they are written in order to make clear and plain, not what is clear and plain already, but what is not so. They may, therefore, be consulted with profit by those who wish to view the subject on all sides, or whose faith labors on particular points. But where scepticism does not originate in want of information, and is not confined to particulars, but takes the form of a general distrust in regard to the whole subject (and this is the common character of modern scepticism), a resort to books on the evidences will often be found, I think, to aggravate rather than remove the evil. Modern scepticism resembles in one respect that disordered state of the affections called misanthropy, which justifies itself on the ground that men are the proper objects of a general distrust: both are general distrusts, and both are to be dealt with in the same way. Now would you think to cure a person laboring under the delusion of misanthropy, by advising him to dwell on the cases of real or supposed deception and treachery which have made him distrustful of everybody, in the hope that these will be cleared up to his entire satisfaction? No: on the contrary, you would advise him to treat these cases as being at the worst but few and exceptional, and therefore as not fairly representing human character; and you would try to draw away his attention and his thoughts from these, and fix them on the bright side of human nature as represented by the multitude of good and upright men whom he has known.

For the same reason, the same or a similar course should be taken with those who have become infected in any way with religious scepticism as a general habit or disease. Let me not be misunderstood. I do not mean that men should be afraid of the difficulties and objections in the way of faith, or try to hush up the controversy respecting them. All I contend for is simply this, that, in so vast and complicated a subject as religion, having to do at every step with the unseen and eternal, difficulties and objections must be expected; and, as some of them are incident to the limitation and imperfection of the human faculties, they never can be entirely done away: so that we must believe, if we believe at all, in spite of these difficulties and objections.

Having in view this state of things, all I ask of the sceptic is, that he would not give way to a morbid tendency of his mind to dwell on these difficulties and objections alone, but enter on a generous and comprehensive survey of the whole subject; in which it will appear that the difficulties and objections are exceptional cases, the best answer to which is found in the cumulative, and to most minds overwhelming, evidence on the other side. The sceptic may hold, if he will, that to all human observation there are spots on the sun's disc; I only ask him to admit, — and it would not seem to be an unreasonable request, — I only ask him to admit that the sun shines, nevertheless.

I will now suppose the sceptic to have cast away the conceit of scepticism, and also to be willing to survey the subject on all sides ; that is, to consider what he believes and knows, as well as what he doubts. If still he does not believe enough, and is anxious to believe more, his next step should be to make the most of what he does believe ; and this in two ways, logically and practically.

In the first place, logically ; that is to say, he should consider not only how much he believes, in express terms, but also every thing which this implies or presupposes. This is the way, I suspect, in which thinking and independent minds commonly expand themselves ; not by borrowing a fragment here and a fragment there, but by unfolding more and more what they already know. A striking example of what I mean is met with in Descartes, the founder of modern metaphysics. Wishing to establish human knowledge on a basis beyond the reach of attack, he began by doubting every thing which could be doubted, and went on this way, rejecting one thing after another, until he came to his own existence. This he found he could not doubt, because the very act of doubting supposed him to exist in order to doubt. Behold him, then, reduced in his faith to belief in his own existence! This he could not help accepting as an incontestable fact, and with it, of course, whatever it involved, implied, or presupposed. His next step was, therefore, to unfold this fact to see what it did involve, imply, or presuppose; which he found to be every thing he had formerly been in the habit of taking on trust. Emanuel Kant is another example among the great thinkers who have recovered their faith in the same way. After having ruined by his criticism, as he thought, the common arguments for morality and religion, he still felt himself to be confronted by conscience, the authority of which he could neither deny nor call in question. Practically, he could not help admitting that he was bound by the moral law; and, consequently, he could not help admitting what this on reflection was seen to involve, imply, or presuppose: to wit, liberty, immortality, and Divine Providence. The faith, therefore, which his speculative reason had shaken, was restored by his practical reason, so that he could go on with as much confidence as before. Here, I hardly need say, we have nothing to do with the soundness or unsoundness of the positions taken by these philosophers. They are referred to merely as showing how men of unsurpassed speculative power, joined to strong sceptical leanings, may begin with believing little and go on to believe more and more, merely by considering what is involved, implied, or presupposed in this little; that is to say, by making the most of this little.

I am also reminded in this connection of Bishop Butler's "Analogy of Religion to the Course of Nature," which a competent judge<sup>1</sup> has pronounced "the most original and profound work extant in any language on the philosophy of religion." The argument in this treatise is not addressed to atheists, but to semi-theists, like Bolingbroke, who admitted the existence of an intelligent Author and natural Governor of the world. Thus much being conceded, Bishop Butler proves that they cannot consistently stop here; by showing that what they already believe involves the analogy — that is, the verisimilitude or probability — of every thing else which religion teaches, together with all the difficulties and objections by which the subject is embarrassed. Some have complained that this celebrated work, from its peculiar structure and drift, is likely to raise more difficulties and objections than it removes. This remark may hold good in respect to a certain class of minds; Mr. Pitt told Wilberforce that it was so with him; still the general rule is unquestionably on the other side. Besides, even in those cases where more difficulties and objections are raised than removed, it does not follow that the book fails of its leading purpose. This purpose is not to prove that there are no difficulties and objections in religion, but to show what we ought to believe and do, and what a wise man will be disposed to believe and do, notwithstanding these difficulties and objections, — a point of view under which, as it seems to me, the argument is unequalled, and in many parts absolutely irresistible.

We have now seen in this way how much may be gained by logically making the most of what we already believe. It remains for us to consider, as being indeed of vastly greater importance at least to the bulk of mankind, how much may also be gained by practically making the most of what we already believe.

Religion, I hardly need say, is not so much a matter of speculation as of practice. Confessedly it is the great practical concernment of human life, and therefore should be judged of by analogies borrowed from practical affairs. Now it may be doubted whether a single great practical interest or measure can be named, which has not its difficult and unsettled questions. Take politics, for example; who will pretend that he has entirely made up his mind on every question connected with this subject? Yet uncertainty on some points hinders him not from acting in respect to others, or even from taking a decided stand, if he conceives the interests or honor of his country, or his own duty as a citizen, require it. If it were a matter of knowledge merely, then it would be a matter of inquiry merely; and our whole duty would consist in continuing to inquire. But it is not so. It is matter of practice; we know, merely that we may put what we know into practice; so that any measure or degree of knowledge, not reduced to practice, fails of its purpose and end, and is therefore in a moral view worse than total ignorance, because it is so much light sinned against by not being acted out. Hence in practical matters,—and again I say, these include religion as the greatest practical concernment of all,—every one must perceive the inconsistency of adopting the rule that we will do nothing until we know every thing.

To return, then, to the sceptic in religion. There are few, I suppose, who carry their scepticism to the extent of believing nothing at all. On some subjects they have their doubts; on others none. Now all I ask of such persons is simply this: that they would be consistent, and reduce to practice what they do believe; carry into effect the principles respecting which they have really made up their minds; or, which is the same thing, live up to that measure of light to which they have actually attained. And let it not be thought that this, in a practical point of view, will turn out to be a small matter. It would be difficult to name a single important doctrine of Christianity, which alone, to be faithfully and entirely carried out, does not require the whole Christian character. Nay, more. We will suppose a man's scepticism to reach the very foundations of Christianity, making it necessary for him to fall back on natural religion, — our argument is still the same. Let him begin by reducing to practice what he does believe, be it little or much. If as yet he believes but little, let him begin by bringing his life into faithful and strict accordance with that little, as a condition of believing more. And here let me remind you again, that a faithful and strict conformity to this little, to one or two doctrines of natural religion, will not turn out to be a small matter. Suppose a man's faith narrowed down to believing that there is a God who is just and good : he is bound, I say, for consistency's sake and for conscience's sake, to live as if in the presence and under the government of such a Being ; and if he really does so, hardly a duty enjoined by Christianity will be left unperformed.

Some may object to this reasoning, that I misconceive the nature of scepticism in making it to consist in the narrowness or brevity of a man's creed. It will be said that modern scepticism shows itself, not so much in the small number of the articles which compose a man's creed, as in the general distrust or misgiving with which the whole creed and all creeds are regarded. The sceptic cannot make up his mind whether religion is a reality at all, in any sense or degree ; whether there is, or is not, a spiritual world, or any world but this. And in this state of his convictions, or rather of his want of conviction, he may think that to act as if religion were a reality would be a kind of untruthfulness, a seeming to believe what he does not believe ; or, at any rate, an inconsistency.

But why so ? Because a man cannot make up his mind as to what he ought to believe, it does not follow that he cannot make up his mind as to what he ought to do. Let it be that he needs more evidence to assure him of the truth and reality of religion : let it be that the evidence is only probable evidence, — nay, that to his mind there is not more than one chance in twenty, or one in a hundred, that religion is true, — I still insist that both duty and consistency require that he should live as religion directs ; that is to say, on the assumption of its truth. For, in the first place, it is plain that in life, in conduct, he must take one side or the other, notwithstanding his doubts. In opinion, a man may be in the condition of one who neither believes nor disbelieves; but in life, in conduct, he cannot be in the condition of one who neither obeys nor disobeys; for not to obey is to disobey. As regards practice, therefore, the question with the sceptic resolves itself into this: is it wiser and better to act on the assumption that religion is true, and run the risk of its turning out to be false, or to act on the assumption of its being false, and run the risk of its turning out to be true? When the alternative is put in this form, and as regards practice it is the only alternative, I cannot help thinking that all must be of one mind.

From not understanding the position here taken, some may ask, Is not this to expect that the sceptic will act without a motive? Certainly not. His motive is the hope of obtaining an infinite good, or the dread of incurring an infinite evil: the magnitude of the stake being such as to make up for any real or supposed deficiency of evidence; so much so, that a bare possibility of the event should be sufficient to determine our conduct. Hence, in the words of Bishop Butler: "Considering the infinite importance of religion, revealed as well as natural, I think it may be said in general, that whoever will weigh the matter thoroughly may see there is not near so much difference, as is commonly imagined, between what ought to be the rule of life to those persons who are fully convinced of its truth, and to those who have only a serious doubting apprehension that it may be true." And again. From these things it must follow, that doubting concerning religion "implies such a degree of evidence for it, as, joined with the consideration of its importance, unquestionably lays men under the obligation before mentioned, to have a dutiful regard to it in all their behavior."

But this is not all. I do not count on the power of the sceptic to persevere in a righteous course on the strength of his doubts, supposing his doubts to continue. My argument is, that he should make the most of the measure of faith he already has, as the appointed and necessary condition of his having more. The habit of obedience, the habit of piety, the habit of prayer, generates a conviction of the reality of moral and spiritual things, which nothing else can give. Who has not found that, in his best moods, — when, for example, he is in the midst of a good work, or when his heart is full of generous affections and purposes, or when he is under the influence of good and holy men, — he finds no difficulty in believing what religion teaches? We have, therefore, but to make our best moods our constant moods, and our doubts would never return.

In this discourse I have supposed a person to resemble the father of the lunatic child mentioned in the Gospels, who "cried out, and said, with tears, Lord, I believe: help thou mine unbelief!" It is the condition of one who has faith, but yet is conscious at times of doubts by which his faith is weakened or disturbed. As a remedy for this defect, it is natural and right to recommend what is called the study of the evidences; a study, however, which will be to little purpose unless the three inculcations insisted on above are regarded. Dismiss from your minds every vestige of the conceit of scepticism. Do not allow your minds to dwell exclusively or unduly on the difficulties of the subject; or be willing, at any rate, to consider that, if there are difficulties in the way of believing, there are greater ones in the way of not believing. Above all, begin, begin to-day, to live up to the measure of light and faith to which you have already attained. Thus will you be in a frame of mind which will dispose you to wish, at least, that the gospel may be true; and, if you superadd earnest and devout prayer, your hearts will be open to receive the needed illumination from above. "Jesus answered them, and said, My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself."

VII.

NOMINAL CHRISTIANS.

“Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven.” — MATT. vii. 21.

OUR Saviour speaks here of nominal Christians, in contradistinction to real Christians. Enough has not been made, as it seems to me, of this distinction; nay, the distinction itself has often been misstated and misunderstood. It is common to say of men who live in a Christian community, but are themselves indifferent to the subject of religion, that they are nominal Christians. The truth is, however, that such persons are not Christians in any sense; they are neither nominal Christians, nor real Christians; they do not pretend even to the name. Nominal Christians, properly so called, are those who feel an interest in the general subject of religion, and are sincerely and perhaps zealously devoted to the Christian sect, as a sect; that is to say, they are Christians in contradistinction to Jews, or Pagans, or Mahometans. They are Christian in sect; they are Christian in name; they have a right to the name; but they are not Christians in reality, because they do not breathe the Christian spirit. Nominal Christians differ from those who are not Christians in any sense, by being sincerely and perhaps ardently attached to the Christian sect and name. On the other hand, they differ from real Christians, because though sincerely and perhaps ardently attached to the Christian sect and name, they do not as individuals breathe the Christian spirit. They are nominal Christians, but they are not real Christians.

According to this distinction, it is obvious, in the first place, that a man's zeal as a nominal Christian may sometimes operate to prevent him from being a real Christian. Thus when some of the early Christians sought by pious frauds to bring over the pagans to their views, many of them were actuated by a sincere zeal for the Christian sect and name. So likewise after the Christians had gotten the civil power into their own hands, and began to turn it against the pagans and heretics, many of them were unquestionably actuated by a sincere zeal for the Christian sect and name. And again in more modern times, when Christians have lost their reason and temper in the heat of theological controversy, there can be no doubt that many of them at least have been moved to it by a sincere zeal for the Christian sect and name. In ways like these, a man's sincere devotedness to the Christian sect and name will sometimes push him into measures that will have the effect to estrange him more and more from real Christianity. A man's zeal for the Christian sect and name, though perfectly sincere and disinterested, will sometimes induce a spirit the very opposite to that which real Christianity breathes. Paradoxical as it may seem, therefore, it is a sincere zeal for the Christian sect and name, that sometimes operates to hinder him from being a real Christian himself.

Secondly, the distinction here insisted on will also lead us to observe, that Christians in all ages have been always more anxious to extend the Christian name and sect than to spread the religion itself. In other words, they have been more anxious to make nominal Christians than real Christians. Take, for example, the conversion of the Franks under Clovis, about the beginning of the sixth century. Clovis and his people were idolaters, but in the distress of the battle of Tolbiac he loudly invoked the God of the Christians, and appears to have ascribed the victory he gained on that occasion to the interposition of the Christians' God. While in this state of mind, the Catholic missionaries found but little difficulty in persuading him and his followers, to the number of three thousand, to submit almost immediately to the rite of baptism. This, the missionaries thought, was to make them Christians. But what sort of Christians must we suppose that the sprinkling of a little water would make out of these fierce and ruthless barbarians, especially as we learn that their conduct and character afterwards were not preceptibly improved? Many centuries afterwards, when the Jesuits first set in motion their scheme for converting South America, we know that they succeeded beyond all parallel, converting the natives by thousands, and by hundreds of thousands. What sort of Christians, however, are we to give them credit for making, it being understood that they did not so much as attempt to cure them of their superstitions, but only sought to give these superstitions another and, in some respects, a worse direction, by turning them to the use of the Church? At one period the English government, moved doubtless by humane considerations, directed that measures should be taken for bringing the negroes on some of the West India Islands within the Christian pale, by the usual initiatory rite. But as the work still went on heavily, a law was passed in 1817 giving the clergyman a bounty of 2s. 6d. a head for every negro he should baptize. This bribe had such effect, that one of the clergy wrote home soon afterwards, that he had already baptized five thousand negroes, and was making arrangements for baptizing, before the close of the year, all the rest on the island, amounting to about twenty thousand more. Now, I ask again, what sort of Christians we can suppose that sprinkling a little water would make out of these wronged and degraded beings, instruction and every other means of moral and religious edification being systematically withheld?

I am aware of the essential difficulties in the case. I am aware that it is in order first to convert men to nominal Christianity; that it is in order first to induce them to join the Christian sect and adopt the Christian name, in the hope that, being thus brought under the influence of Christian doctrines and institutions, they may in time become real Christians. The apostles themselves proceeded in this way; and there was no other way in which they could proceed. What we object to is, that any should feel chiefly anxious to convert men to nominal Christianity; that they should feel satisfied with converting men to nominal Christianity; that they should think their work done, or half done, when men are induced to join the Christian sect and submit to its outward rites, and assume the Christian name. Men are not real Christians because they are nominal Christians, because they belong to any one of the Christian sects, or because they are ever so sincerely devoted to the Christian name. Men are not real Christians because they are Calvinists, or Unitarians, or Baptists. They are not real Christians until, as individuals, they breathe the Christian spirit, and live a Christian life.

Again, we sometimes hear of Christian communities, of Christian States; but the distinctions pointed out in this discourse between nominal and real Christians make it clear that there is no State, and that there never has been one, which can be pronounced Christian except in name. Christianity may be perhaps the popular worship, its truth and importance may be recognized by the laws, and provision may be made for its institutions by public enactments, and perhaps at the public charge. Still this does not prove that the State, considered as a whole community, is penetrated throughout with the Christian spirit, and determined and governed in all things by Christian principles. It only proves that the State, in its public capacity, has joined itself to the Christian sect; that it calls itself Christian; that it is to be regarded as part of Christendom; that it is a

Christian State and not a Mahometan State: in one word, that it is nominally Christian. Name, if you can, the State in any age, or in any part of the world, which, considered as a whole community, can be pronounced really Christian! Where is the nation in which the laws, the customs, the institutions, — in which literature, public opinion, and public amusements, — are uniformly or generally in accordance with the spirit and precepts of the New Testament? Where is the government that is administered by none but real Christians, and invariably or generally according to Christian principles, and in the Christian spirit? Where is the people on the face of the earth, who, as a whole people, love God supremely, and one another as themselves? Not one, not one! I suppose that without undue national vanity we may say of the moral and religious condition of our own country, that it will compare favorably with that of any other. When we look around, however, and observe how little there is amongst us of a truly Christian spirit; what vague and imperfect notions prevail of the Christian character, of Christian philanthropy, and even of Christian honesty; and behold also the jealousies and the chicanery, and the mean and bad passions which trouble the course of human affairs, and the consent in great public wrongs, — I fear it would be a mere compliment to say even of the people of this community, that they are as a body, that they are universally, or even generally, real Christians. Doubtless in every Christian community individuals may be found who are real Christians; but, I repeat it, the community, considered as a whole community, is Christian only in name. History has not, as yet, furnished us with a single example of a truly Christian people, of a whole community pervaded and governed throughout by the spirit and law of Christ.

I go further than this. I have spoken of States, and I would now speak of religious sects. I believe there is no sect, and that there never has been one, which can be pronounced Christian except in name. I make no exceptions, for I believe in my conscience there is none. Doubtless there is no considerable religious sect in which individuals cannot be found who are real Christians; and in some religious sects there may be more real Christians than in others; and the views held by some sects may be, in themselves considered, peculiarly favorable to the nurture of a truly Christian character. Still, when we come to read the history of these sects, I fear we shall find that, without a solitary exception, they have been swayed, as sects, by a spirit oftentimes not only not Christian, but positively antichristian. I fear it will be found that, without a solitary exception, they have borrowed their notions of policy, as sects, from the world, and not from the New Testament. We may think that it was different formerly, but history does not confirm this impression. Cardinal Barberini being present at Rome, at the canonization of a saint whom he had himself personally known, and known to be unworthy of that honor, could not help whispering to a bystander, that these new saints put him in strange doubts and difficulties about the old ones. I fear it will be found, moreover, that those especially who take the lead in religious sects, and stamp the character of the party, are not commonly men very remarkable for the Christian virtues of charity, meekness, and heavenly mindedness. In common parlance, we call all these sects Christian sects; and it is proper that we should, for they have a right to the name. As sects, they are probably sincere in their profession of attachment to the Christian name, and belong therefore to the Christian denomination; in other words, they are nominally Christian. They have a right to the name, all of them. They are Christians in contradistinction to atheists or deists, to Jews or Mahometans. They have a right to the name,—all of them; but still they want the reality. They are not, as sects, pervaded throughout, and influenced and determined in all their measures, by the spirit and example of Jesus.

Thus have I endeavored to point out and illustrate the true distinction between nominal and real Christianity. I have also shown that it is nominal Christianity only, which can be said as yet to prevail even in Christendom, in Christian States, and in Christian sects. One great revolution has been wrought in converting men to nominal Christianity. Another and still more important revolution remains yet to be wrought, in order to convert them, as a body, to real Christianity.

From this doctrine there are two practical inferences which I must entreat you to ponder well.

In the first place, it supplies us with a full and perfect answer to the popular objection to Christianity, derived from the inconsistencies and vices of professed Christians. They are not the inconsistencies and vices of real Christians. Now it is manifestly absurd to make Christianity answerable for the conduct of those who, by the very terms of the proposition, have not as yet been converted to real Christianity. Bring me a man who is thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the gospel, and who has brought his whole life and mind into subjection to the law of Christ, and I admit that it would be perfectly fair to try the merits of the religion by the conduct of the disciple. Point me to a community that is pervaded and governed throughout by the spirit and maxims of the New Testament, and I admit that it would be perfectly fair, in such a case, to try the merits of the religion by its actual results. But in the name of reason and common sense, why would you charge on Christianity itself the inconsistencies and vices which originate in a want of Christianity? With what show even of plausibility can you make real Christianity responsible for the inconsistencies and vices of those who are not real Christians, but only nominal Christians?

My second inference from the doctrine of this discourse is still more personal and direct in its application. Amidst the immense number and variety of nominal Christians, where are we to look for real Christians? And yet it is only in proportion as men become real Christians, that they can hope to be saved. Submitting to ordinances will avail us nothing; assenting to propositions will avail us nothing; being clamorous for what we deem the truth will avail us nothing; giving our bodies to be burned will avail us nothing, — without the temper and life of a real Christian. How many thousand martyrs have poured out their blood like water in the name of Christ, and yet have not breathed his spirit, and therefore were none of his! The world stands in need of another regeneration, deeper and more spiritual than the first, converting men from nominal Christianity to real Christianity. We want something more than mere profession; we want something more than mere belief, however sincere; we want something more than mere zeal, however disinterested and self-sacrificing; we want something more than a mere external sobriety and virtue. We must pray to be imbued with the Christian spirit; we must resolve to live a Christian life. "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." "Many will say to me, in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name, and in thy name have cast out devils, and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work iniquity."

THE DAILY CROSS.

“And he said unto them all, If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me.”—
LUKE ix. 23.

IT is often mentioned, and not without reason, as one proof of the honesty of the first Christians, that they did not hold out before their followers the lure of an easy or self-indulgent life. “Then,” said our Saviour, “they shall deliver you up to be afflicted, and shall kill you, and ye shall be hated of all nations for my name’s sake.” “They shall lay hands on you, and persecute you, delivering you up to the synagogues, and into prisons; and ye shall be betrayed both by parents and brethren and kinsfolk and friends.” “But these things have I told you, that when the time shall come ye may remember that I told you of them.”

All must admit that this was dealing fairly and honestly with men. At the same time, I am bound to say that I think it was also dealing wisely with them. Men of a strong, earnest, and resolved spirit, the only men to be relied upon in building up a new religion, if convinced of the importance of a cause, are only won to it the more by the difficulties and dangers which environ it. To the interest of the duty is thus added the interest of the struggle. The only minds which are likely to be repelled are timid, distrustful, unsteady minds; these however are not the strength, but the weakness of a struggling cause. They constitute the unsound part of the army, which at some critical moment of the battle starts a panic, or goes over to the enemy; and by this treachery of weakness, if not of purpose, betrays all. For a forlorn hope, a hundred picked men, without an individual who knows what it is to hesitate or falter in a noble enterprise, are stronger by far than ten times that number if mixed with here and there a faint heart, sufficient to infect the whole with irresolution, with even so much as the thought of turning back. The first Christians were picked men. It was necessary this should be so; and that they were so, we owe it, under God, to the whirlwind of persecution which met them everywhere, winnowing the chaff from the wheat; and not only the chaff, but all the light and imperfect kernels.

hands of the pagans into those of the Christians: and, after that, none but heretics could aspire to the glory of martyrdom; and even in respect to them, the fires of persecution began to burn lower and lower. The Christian world was soon made to feel how much it had lost, in losing the purifying influence of suffering; and, to supply the defect, they very naturally resorted to artificial means: partly to self-inflicted tortures, and partly to the fasts and penances of the Church.

Of the self-inflicted tortures it is hardly possible for us, at the present day, to speak as we should, because it is hardly possible for us to enter into the thoughts and feelings of the persons whom we undertake to judge. They believed, — that is, those at least who were most active in introducing ascetic practices into the Church, believed, — that matter was wholly evil; that all our natural affections and desires were sinful, and sinful only, and that continually; that the war between the flesh and the spirit was a war of extermination; that the body was not something to be subdued and regulated, but something to be spurned, mortified, killed. With these views their duty was plain. It would be well for us if we lived up to our idea of what makes a good man, as nearly as they did up to theirs.

Of the fasts and penances of the Church I cannot say as much. Imposed, but not self-imposed, they have always been liable to be used as the instruments of tyranny and oppression on one part, and to beget nothing better than hypocrisy or formality on the other. Among a rude people, in order to tame their ferocity and turbulence, and bring them under subjection to a spiritual rule, this discipline may sometimes have answered a good purpose; but even here I suspect that the benefit has been almost always overrated. It is a required, a coerced, and therefore for the most part an outside penitence. It has no living root, like the self-tortures of the anchorite, in the moral aspirations of the sufferer himself. However this may be, it is certain that Church fasts and penances in these last days, except with the very ignorant and a few devotees, have sunk into a byword for their insignificance.

These are some of the ways in which the Christians of other times were called upon, or thought themselves called upon, to crucify "the flesh with the affections and lusts;" but it is plain that we must look elsewhere for occasions to prove our faith and constancy.

But the times just referred to have been, and have passed away. Persecution, in the sense in which that word used to be understood, is no longer to be expected in the ordinary course of events. Neither are any of us likely, with our notions of life and duty, to think it necessary or wise to submit to ascetic practices, whether self-imposed, or imposed by the Church. Still, what our Lord says in the text must be considered as applicable to all times: "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me."

Never was the earnest inculcation of this precept more needed than at the present day. Surrounded, as many Christians now are, by ease, security, and abundance, they are tempted not only to neglect the self-denying virtues, but almost to forget their obligations and the important place they hold in the Christian life. When a cross is actually laid upon us by Providence, when it cannot be averted, all I suppose will agree that it ought to be borne, and borne with firmness and a calm trust; but that we are frequently called upon to submit to self-denial not from necessity but from choice, or, in other words, to take up our cross voluntarily, and to take it up daily, is not so generally conceded. To some it may even sound as no better than a futile attempt to revive the self-inflicted austerities of the cloister, which the age, as all Protestants at least will allow, has outgrown.

What, then, is meant by that self-denial which is so frequently enjoined upon all men, in the New Testament? Every one is required to take up his cross daily; but what to crucify?

There is the more need of some explanation here, because the term self-denial, if literally understood, might mislead. We are not to deny ourselves in the sense of denying our whole selves; for this would be to deny what is good in us, as well as what is bad. What then, I ask again, are we to deny?

Every one must be conscious of being under the influence of two orders of propensities and desires: the higher, or those which belong to him as a rational and moral being; and the lower, or those which belong to him as a sensual and selfish being. Even the lower tendencies of our nature are not bad in themselves; they are bad only when they interfere with the proper development, or with the proper gratification, of the higher. Here then it is, that Christian self-denial begins and ends; we are to deny the solicitations of our lower nature, whenever they interfere with the aspirations of our higher nature. Christian self-denial does not require us to deny our nature as a whole, but only to be true to our nature as a whole; that is, to take care that the rightful subordination amongst its various springs of action shall be maintained.

Christian self-denial does not require us to deny our happiness; that is to say, our highest happiness; but only to be true to that happiness, by repressing every appetite or passion which puts itself in opposition to it, or which tends to frustrate or endanger it.

Again, neither reason nor the New Testament makes the moral value of self-denial depend on the pain it costs. This pain is the measure, not so much of what we have done, as of what we have yet to do, in order to make ourselves thoroughly good men. It is manifestly the sign of an unformed or of a half-formed Christian character, to find it hard to keep under the lower propensities of our nature, when they stand in the way of moral progress. If we cannot give up without reluctance or regret any appetite or desire, as soon as we see it to interfere with our highest good, so much the worse for us; but we can hardly set down such reluctance or regret, or the pain it gives us, to the score of merit. Who would think that a man ought to be praised or rewarded for the pain it costs him to keep himself from lying or stealing? He would feel none of this pain, if his nature had been properly disciplined; and the moral value of self-denial consists in its tendency to bring about this discipline: to teach every part of our nature to know its place, and keep its place, and thus to co-operate harmoniously and spontaneously in promoting the highest good of the individual. The moral value of self-denial does not consist in the pain it costs, but in its tendency to induce a habit of virtue, under the influence of which the practice of virtue will become agreeable and easy; so as, in the end, that is to say in heaven, to dispense with the necessity of self-denial altogether.

Self-denial, therefore, is not an end but a means; the end being to convert, through the power of habit, a painful and constrained obedience into a joyful and free obedience. The highest form of virtue is not the virtue of self-denial, but of earnest and irrepressible love; when duty has ceased to be a task and become a pleasure, a kind of necessity. Hence that sublime doctrine of the New Testament. "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him; and he cannot sin, because he is born of God."

Not entirely satisfied with this view of the subject, some may still ask, "What! is there not more moral worth in an action requiring great self-denial, than in one requiring little or none? For example; is not a choleric man more meritorious for keeping his temper, under great provocation, than he would be if by nature or habit mild and self-possessed? Is not a man who abstains from intoxicating drinks, though he hankers for them, more meritorious than he would be if he did not hanker for them, if he loathed them?"

These questions are often put in a tone which would seem to imply that they must be answered in the affirmative; yet such an answer will be found to involve consequences which nobody, I suppose, would care to admit. It would follow that, just in proportion as a man succeeds in subduing and extirpating his evil inclinations, the merit of his obedience must become less and less, until at last it entirely disappears. Thus, to recur to the examples just given; were a man to succeed in entirely overcoming a choleric temper, or a hankering for intoxicating drinks, — as a good man is very likely to do, or at any rate aims to do, — after that he would be gentle or temperate as a matter of course; but there would be no merit in it, because there would be no difficulty in it: it would be worth nothing, for it would cost nothing. Or take a case of a somewhat different description. Suppose a man to begin to attend church from a sense of duty, though it is extremely irksome to him. For a while, on the principle assumed above, there would be great merit in it, because it would call for great self-denial. But suppose the man, in process of time, to become deeply interested in religion and in religious services. Of course he will still continue to attend church. Now, however, instead of its being irksome to him, he finds the greatest delight in it. But if so, then, on the principle assumed above, there would be no merit in it; attending church would be no better than a kind of self-indulgence.

Obviously, therefore, it will not do to estimate the deserts of a Christian by the degree of self-denial which accompanies his conduct; certainly not by the degree of self-denial which now accompanies his conduct.

Most of the error or perplexity on this subject has probably grown out of not distinguishing between the judgment passed on single actions, and the judgment passed on the character of the agent. In pronouncing judgment on a single action we are influenced and determined, I allow, in no small measure, by the amount of self-denial it costs. We admire an act of self-sacrifice; we cannot help admiring such an act, whatever we may think of the agent in other respects; that is to say, whatever we may think of his character generally. We cannot help admiring a generous or just action when performed in the face of great difficulty and great opposition; because it was less to be expected on this account; because it supposes great effort, and this, again, great strength of purpose; because it is a triumph of the human will,

a triumph in which we can all sympathize, and one in which we all seem to share. Hence, I suppose it is, that our Saviour has said, "Likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety-and-nine just persons which need no repentance." It is not meant that the new convert is an object of more favor or confidence, in himself considered, than a man of tried and confirmed virtue; undoubtedly he is not an object of as much of either. Still there is something in the single act by which the sinner breaks away from his old habits, and tramples under foot his evil inclinations, and turns unto God,—something so unexpected, so auspicious, so heroic,—that it cannot fail to excite at the moment in all good beings, on earth and in heaven, a peculiar joy and admiration,—a momentary burst of exultation.

But the joy and admiration inspired by a single action, at the moment of its performance, have nothing to do, at any rate nothing to do definitely, with what will become of the agent himself at last, or with the sober and just estimate to be made of his deserts on the whole. As men we are to be judged, as the Scriptures say, according to our deeds; but not according to our deeds taken singly and abstractly, and without reference to the influence they have on ourselves; nor yet according to any real or supposed preponderance of our good deeds over our bad deeds, or of our bad deeds over our good deeds, taken abstractly and numerically. We are to be judged according to our deeds in this sense only: we are to be judged according to the moral state or condition in which all our deeds, taken together, have left us. "God looketh on the heart." Every man is to be judged according to what he is in himself; according to what he has become, — his past actions having nothing to do with his present or his future prospects, except in so far as they have contributed to make his dispositions and character what they now are; or, in other words, have contributed to make him what he has become.

Hence it appears that the rule, according to which we pass judgment on actions taken singly and abstractly, is very different from that according to which we pass judgments on men. The glory of an action depends on its unexpectedness, on its difficulty, on the moral force or moral courage it displays, sometimes even on the general degradation of the agent; for the glory of the single action may be, that one so degraded in other respects should suddenly raise himself to so noble a thought, to so high an endeavor. But, when we speak of the worth of a man, we always make it to depend on what he is in himself; that is to say, on the habits he has formed ; not on the amount of discipline which he has undergone, simply and abstractly considered, but on the effect this discipline has had on his character ; on the degree of harmony, purity, and elevation of soul which he has actually gained ; in one word, to adopt the language in which the Scriptures express the change, on his having been “born again,” on his having become “a new creature.” We think better of an action in proportion to the difficulty and self-denial it involves ; but, when we turn from the action to the man, we think better of him in proportion as he is in a condition to do the same thing without any difficulty at all, without any self-denial at all. The best man, the perfect man, if we could find one, would be a person with whom, in ordinary circumstances, it would be as easy and natural to fulfil all righteousness, as to breathe.

This distinction being understood and admitted, we see at once that self-denial is not the Christian character, nor an essential part of it, but only one of the instrumentalities by which the Christian character is formed. Self-denial does not belong to us as Christians ; that is to say, as perfect Christians : for, in the perfect Christian, duty and pleasure become one ; no place is therefore left for self-denial : it belongs to us as persons who aspire to be Christians, who are learning to be Christians.

In saying this, however, I do but say that, in point of fact, it belongs to us all; for what can be truly said of the best of us, except that we are learning or aspiring to be Christians? — some in the midst of the process, some just beginning, others only thinking about beginning, if indeed so much as that. In respect to all such persons without exception, the gospel teaches that it is only by self-denial, — that is, by crossing, restraining, and subduing the lower tendencies of our nature whenever they interfere with the higher tendencies of our nature, — that each one can bring his character into harmony with itself, and subject the whole to the law of Christ.

The fact that we have fallen upon easy and prosperous times, and are tempted by abundance and opportunity on every side, only makes this discipline so much the more indispensable. In a barren and poor country the people are abstemious and frugal, not from self-denial, but from necessity. And so in the case of individuals. An ambitious young man, starting in life with nothing to depend upon but his own exertions to make his way in the world, is comparatively in no danger from the love of ease or pleasure: if his conscience or his ambition do not restrain him, his want of means will. It is not until luxury abounds, and the means of self-indulgence are brought within the reach of all, that degeneracy is likely to prevail ; for it is not until then, that the vices of self-indulgence become possible, — I mean, generally so, and to a ruinous extent. This, then, would seem to be the law : As any people advance in wealth and refinement, the restraints of necessity are gradually taken off ; after which, it is only in so far as their place is supplied by the restraints of self-denial, that the national decay and ruin are stayed. History tells us how it was with the civilizations which were founded on paganism. They stood the trials of adversity ; but under the trials of prosperity they all fell. If a better fate awaits the civilizations founded on Christianity, it will be mainly owing, under God, to its doctrine of the cross ; to the fact that these civilizations are thoroughly penetrated with the spirit of him who has said, “If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross daily, and follow me.”

Not only is self-denial becoming every day more necessary, but also more difficult. Much is said of the self-denying virtues of our fathers, under the hardships and privations of the early settlement of this country, and in their struggle for independence ; and I heartily concur in the honor in which they are held on this account. Still all must agree, that it is not as hard to bear restraints which our condition has laid upon us, and which we know we cannot throw off if we would, as it is to bear restraints which we have laid upon ourselves, and which we know we can continue to bear, or not, as we please. No doubt it is hard to perform a task set us by an inevitable Providence; but it is harder still to set the same task to ourselves, and still be faithful to it. In the former case, we have but one thought: it must be borne; in the latter, we have the alternative, duty on one side, and indulgence on the other. We can bear it or not as we please; and it is the knowledge of this alternative, more even than hunger and nakedness, more even than prisons and scaffolds, which tries men's souls. We often hear it said, that the spirit of martyrdom is dying out. I believe no such thing. I believe that, if persecution for opinion's sake were to be revived to-day, there would be as many who would be burned at the stake, rather than deny the faith, as at any former period. The spirit of this form of martyrdom is latent merely because the exigency does not exist to call it forth. Meanwhile we have our own peculiar cross to bear,—a cross, too, which in one respect is harder to bear than that of persecution; for it is not laid upon us by others, but we are required to take it up of our own accord and lay it on ourselves, and bear it with unshrinking fortitude, with untiring constancy.

What adds to the difficulty of self-denial at the present day is, that it requires not only self-control, but self-knowledge. Every man is called upon in the text to take up his cross daily; but what to crucify? I answer, His bosom sin. As was said before, self-denial does not consist in denying our whole selves, but in denying any and every propensity of our lower nature which comes in competition with our higher nature. It is to deny the body, that we may be true to the soul; it is to deny what is worldly in us, that we may be true to what is heavenly in us; it is neither more nor less than a practical recognition of the sovereignty of reason and conscience and faith over passion and appetite. But the rebel which is to be denied and subdued in your heart is probably very different from the rebel which is to be denied and subdued in mine. With one man it is the love of ease; with another it is the love of pleasure; with another it is an irascible temper; with another it is the love of money; with another it is a selfish ambition. Nay, we may have aspirations, which, in their proper connection and subordination, are among the most amiable and commendable, — such as a thirst for knowledge, a desire of honorable distinction, — but which turn traitors when they tempt us to be unfaithful to virtue and religion. Our Saviour has said, “He that loveth father or mother more than me, is not worthy of me ; and he that loveth son or daughter more than me, is not worthy of me." Every one therefore must be willing to know the cherished idol of his own heart, whatever it may be, though aware that his object in knowing it is, that he may deny it and put it under his feet.

Remember also what has been already intimated more than once. We are not merely to deny, we are to subdue, our rebellious inclinations, — the lusts and desires that war against the soul. The moral worth of self-denial does not consist in the pain it costs, but in its tendency to curb the lower propensities of our nature, to restore a lost symmetry and harmony of character, to induce the habit of natural, easy, and spontaneous obedience to the Divine will. A man may fight against his sins all his life long, and fight bravely, and die fighting ; if however he does not conquer them, it is plain that he will die in his sins. The battle is necessary ; the battle however is not for the sake of the battle, but for the sake of the victory. The life of God in the soul of man begins in struggle and self-denial ; but it ends in love and repose.

What then, in conclusion, does Christianity require of us under the name of self-denial ? Not self-mortification ; which is nothing but the folly of morbid consciences. Not austerities of any kind; which are nothing but the despotism of a proud spirit playing the tyrant over its own tastes and inclinations. But she warns us, that our condition in this life is not constituted on the plan of ease and safety, but on that of difficulty and conflict. She warns us that our nature, if left to itself, will go to destruction. She warns us that the first duty incumbent on every man that lives is the duty of ruling his own spirit, and putting every rebellious principle under his feet. Under these circumstances, what religion requires of us is the firm and sure step of one who has gained the mastery over himself, and uses this mastery in the pursuit of the noblest ends by the noblest means. And she requires it of us all. She requires it of us as men; above all, she requires it of us as Christians. She holds up before us the sacred symbol of our faith, and proclaims the law: By this you are to conquer. And, knowing our weakness and our need of help, she conjures us, she beseeches us, to bow meekly and humbly before the Crucified One, whom we acknowledge as our Example and Lord, that we may arm ourselves with the same mind that was in him. She also comforts us by repeating his words: "In this world ye shall have tribulation: but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world."

IX.

ON KEEPING THE PROMISES WE MAKE TO OURSELVES.

“And Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father’s house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God.” — GENESIS xxviii. 20, 21.

THIS is the first formal vow on record, though the practice itself appears to have existed from the earliest times. It had its foundation in human nature. In the infancy of the world men did not look on God as we do; they did not regard him as a Spirit, or think that those who worship him should worship him in spirit and in truth. They revered him, it is true, as a superior Being; but still as having like interests and like passions with themselves,—susceptible to attentions and flattery, expecting favor for favor, and therefore to be propitiated by votive services and offerings. The Jewish lawgiver, finding this custom in existence, adopted it into his code, though, as it would seem, not so much to recommend it, as to subject it to proper regulations, and to prevent abuses. According to him, vows when made were, as a general rule, to be kept; still he is careful to say, "But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin."

In our days vows have fallen into disuse, partly, no doubt, from the spread of a more rational faith; and partly also, I am afraid, from a less worthy cause, namely, a growing neglect on the part of many to recognize their personal relations to God in the affairs of life, or to appeal to the sanctions of religion in aid of duty. I do not mean that men have given up, or are likely to give up, promising what they will do in the future. The change consists in this: instead of making these promises, as they once did, to God, they now make them to one another; or, more frequently still, to themselves. Hardly an individual can be found who does not at times promise himself, that, in certain contingencies, he will take a certain course or do certain things which he believes to be right. Thus a large portion of the most solemn promises which we make consists of those which we make to ourselves; and my object in the present discourse will be to set forth our duty in respect to this class of promises, — the promises which we make to ourselves.

Even the schoolboy, mortified at the poor appearance he has made after having neglected his lesson, promises himself that he will be more attentive in future, and avoid the recurrence of a like disgrace. An ingenuous youth, betrayed into imprudence or crime by his inexperience, or by bad counsels, promises himself that in future he will be more on his guard. A man of a quick and hot temper says or does, in a fit of unrestrained anger, what he afterwards sincerely regrets ; he therefore promises himself that in future he will keep a harder curb on his passions. A man is led on little by little in play, until he finds that he has gained or lost a considerable sum, — in short, that he is fast becoming a gambler ; and, alarmed at the tendency of these things, he promises himself that no temptation shall ever induce him again to take a card into his hands. A man awakes after the debauch of the last night, feverish and sick, ashamed and penitent, and promises himself that from that moment he will break for ever from the scenes, company, and amusements which have so often had power to overcome his best resolutions. A man begins a new study, engages in a new and difficult undertaking, enters upon new and important relations in life ; and, made serious by the uncertainty of the future, he promises himself that nothing which he can do or dare shall be wanting to his success. A man is interrupted in a worldly and thoughtless career by a dangerous sickness, and being forcibly led by his situation to review his past conduct, and consider his unfitness for eternity, he promises himself that should he recover, he will commence a new life.

I might go on multiplying illustrations without end, but enough has been said to indicate the number and variety of the promises which men are continually making to themselves. They constitute, as I have said, a large proportion of the best considered and most solemn promises which any of us make. Nobody will deny that they are made, for the most part, in good faith, and with a serious purpose of fulfilling them; that they are entered into in our best moods, that they are the dictates of our best judgment, and that it would be best for us on every account to keep them. Yet the readiness and frequency with which they are broken has become a proverb. Why is this?

Some may think it not only accounted for, but justified or at least excused, on the ground that the promises which we make to ourselves are merely secret purposes or resolutions, which we are at liberty to change when we please. But I cannot agree to either part of this statement. Let it be that the promises in question are only another way of saying to ourselves what we propose to do in particular cases; in other words, that they are nothing but another name for good resolutions. Even in this view of the matter, I deny that we are at liberty to change them when we please. No matter whether we regard them as promises properly so called, or merely as good resolutions, we have no right to forget them, or set them aside, when the moment for action arrives. We have no right not to make the good resolutions; much less, to break them after they have been made.

But I do not concede what has just been assumed. A clear distinction can be drawn, as it seems to me, between general resolutions to do well, and specific promises made to ourselves that we will pursue a particular line of conduct. You know how it is in our dealings with others in analogous cases. If I merely say, in general phrase, that I mean to serve a friend, but do not promise any particular service, he cannot claim any particular service at my hands. If, on the contrary, my expression of good wishes takes the form of a specific promise to do this or that, he can hold me to my word. And so in my intercourse with myself. So long as I can put myself off with good resolutions; that is, with general purposes to repent and do well hereafter, — I may postpone fulfilling them day after day, and month after month, and year after year, and yet not feel that I have abandoned them. I may still hold and cherish the same good resolutions to repent and do well hereafter. But if I solemnly promise myself that on a certain occasion, or at a certain time, I will do a particular thing, and fail to do it. I know and feel that I have broken my word. I know and feel that I cannot be relied on; and, what is more and worse, that I cannot rely on myself. Again, a particular and specific promise is more even than a particular and specific resolution for another reason. In all such cases, the promise is the resolution begun to be carried out. I have proceeded so far as to give my word to that effect; and if this is nothing, it must be because my word is nothing.

Again, others may hastily conclude that promises made to ourselves are not binding, because they are not published; because they are known to ourselves alone; because there is no witness. But here, as before, I cannot admit either the fact, or the inference from the fact. What is it, I would begin by asking, that makes any promise binding? Not human laws; for all human laws might be struck out of being, without making our promises any the less binding on our consciences. Nor yet the mere fact that by publishing the promise we have raised expectations in others; for a promise extorted from us by force, or obtained by false pretences, will have the effect to raise expectations in others: but this will not make such a promise morally binding. A promise is binding, when in a fair and full view of the subject we voluntarily enter into engagements, by which we stand pledged to regulate our future conduct. Now all this holds true of the promises in question. For example, when a sick man promises that, should he recover, he will amend his ways; or the conscience-stricken oppressor, that he will repent of his misdeeds and make reparation for the wrongs he has done, — in all such cases it will not be denied that a promise is really made, and made voluntarily, and in a fair and full view of the subject, and with an expectation of performing it; and that such will be our duty. But there is no witness! Suppose, for a moment, there were none; this might affect the means of proving or enforcing the promise, but not its moral obligation. If you were at a loss whether you had made the promise or not, it might be of importance to call in witnesses to satisfy you on that point; but what need is there of witnesses to prove a fact which is not doubted? Besides, this supposition that there is no witness, is wholly gratuitous. There is a witness, — that Being whose eye is everywhere, on the evil and on the good, — there is a witness whose presence is felt and acknowledged at the time of making the promise. Moreover, it is the witness of that Eye, and not the witness of the many eyes of the world, which is the foundation of our responsibility in all cases, even for our most public acts. That Eye is upon us in all places, at all times. It penetrates into our most secret thoughts; it is acquainted with our most secret promises; it remembers them whether we do or not, and it will call them into judgment at the last day.

There is also another ground for evading our duty in respect to the promises we make to ourselves, which is likely to occur to some minds. It may be said that, when a man makes a promise to himself, he is both parties to the contract; not only promiser, but promisee; so that should he afterwards conclude to break it, he can do so without blame on obtaining his own consent: for this, as in the present case it comprehends the consent of both parties, is authority sufficient to annul the most solemn compact. But, in the first place, whoever should reason thus forgets, — no, he does not forget, but he refuses or neglects to consider, — that when such promises are entered into it is distinctly understood on the part of the promiser's conscience, that they shall never be made the subject of this sort of tampering. No one, I suppose, will pretend that the promiser, at the time of making such a promise, means to leave himself at liberty to keep it or not as he sees fit ; for if so, why make the promise ? He would do what he sees fit when the time comes round, without the promise, just as well.

Moreover, though the promise is made to the same person who makes it, it is not made to the same person in the same capacity. It is the self in both cases, but the self considered as divided into two, — the acting self and the judging self. It is the will making a promise to the conscience. Make the most, therefore, of this right to release ourselves from the obligation of such a promise, it is a right which belongs exclusively to the conscience ; for it was to the conscience that the promise was originally made. But who will say, that, when we break the promises we have made to ourselves, it is commonly from the calm and unbiassed consent of our consciences ? Who does not know that, in nine cases out of ten, our unfaithfulness to such promises is owing to the reascendancy of the very passions against which the promise was directed, and which it was intended to restrain, but which are again allowed to bear down conscience, and the promise too ? Indeed, I might insist that in most instances the promise is not so much made to ourselves, as to God. It is, to all intents and purposes, the reproduction, under a modern form, of the ancient vow.

Even though in form we make the promise to ourselves, we often do it looking to God as the witness and guaranty of our sincerity ; which virtually involves a promise to Him, that we will be faithful to the promises which we make to ourselves. And He will hold us to such promises.

When therefore, in a moral and religious view of our responsibilities, we promise ourselves to fulfil a particular duty, it appears to me that this promise is of the nature of a bond on the soul. It is an engagement voluntarily entered into, in a fair and full view of the circumstances ; and there is also a witness, or rather there are witnesses, to the engagement,—God and our own consciences,—to whom we are pledged for its fulfilment, and often under all the solemnities of a religious vow. Habit or custom may make it seem a light thing to trifle with such engagements ; but in morals it is not a light thing ; in the sight of God it is not a light thing. Neither human laws nor public opinion have any thing to do with the making or the keeping of these solemn engagements ; it is enough to know that they will be judged at the bar of eternal justice, and that any attempt to evade their strict fulfilment by casuistical distinctions will be regarded like the kindred one in social morality,—that of attempting to avoid the payment of an honest debt by a legal quibble.

Apart also from these clear and solemn inculcations of conscience and religion, I might appeal to every man's self-respect, as a motive to fulfil the promises he makes to himself. Is it not an humbling and mortifying thought, that we cannot depend on our own word for our own good? As for the promises of others, we expect they will often fail us. We expect to be often deceived, cheated, betrayed by other people; but has it come to this, that we cannot rely on ourselves? If we could believe that our infidelity to the promises we are now considering grew out of a real change of opinion as to the wisdom of them, it would be different. But it is not so. When the drunkard returns to his cups, or the gamester to his haunts, after having solemnly abjured them in his own thought, do you suppose, does anybody suppose, does he even suppose himself, that it is because he has altered his mind as to the ruinous tendency of such conduct? No! it is mere weakness and irresolution; the bondage of evil habit. With his eyes open to the folly of his course, and perfectly aware of the promises he is violating, he returns to practices which he still, in his better judgment, condemns and abhors as much as ever. Who, I ask again, is willing that this should be said of him, that it should be a faithful picture of his own life, even though we were to leave out of view duty and religion, and look only to self-respect? Yet it is a faithful picture of every one's life, who cannot rely on the promises he makes to himself.

Shall we then abstain from making such promises, lest we should incur the guilt and shame of violating them? There are many, I know, who contend against all making of promises respecting the future, on the plea that we ought to do what we think to be right at the time, taking care to leave ourselves as much untrammelled on moral questions as possible. But this reasoning proceeds on the mistaken notion, that our greatest danger is either that we shall not know what is right, or that we shall not do it from the highest motive. On the contrary, our greatest danger in point of fact is, that, though we know what is right, we shall fail to do it from any motive; being turned aside by passion, or some supposed present interest, or mere indifference or apathy. Hence it follows that what we most need is, to fortify beforehand our general purpose to do well, especially in respect to those dangers and temptations which we have found to have the greatest power over us.

Behold, then, the occasion and use of the open pledge and the secret promise! They do not displace a sense of duty, and the fear of God; but they reënforce these motives, and often give them the victory. Having pledged ourselves beforehand to our own souls that we will take and pursue a certain course, when the moment of trial arrives we shall feel, in addition to all the other motives, the motive growing out of having solemnly entered into such an engagement. Frail and uncertain as this dependence is, it is something; and it is not for beings, weak and tempted as we are, to reject or to slight any auxiliary to virtue. Nay, nothing truly great and excellent can be attained in any profession or calling, unless a man prescribes to himself a particular line of conduct, and adheres to it with constancy. Yet this is to promise himself what he will do; and having done so, if he has not truthfulness and stability enough to keep the promise, he is born to inferiority as certainly and irrevocably as if it were stamped on his forehead.

Besides, in our present circumstances we cannot refrain altogether from making promises to ourselves, even if we try. When we look abroad on the works of God, and behold them everywhere marked with the traces of Divine benignity, how is it possible for us not to promise ourselves to lead a life of grateful obedience to the Giver of all good? When we open the Scriptures and read there the story of the merits and sacrifices of the sinless One, and dwell on his example of unearthly purity and peace, and are touched by his redeeming spirit, how is it possible that we should not promise ourselves to become his disciples, — if not to-day, at least at some future time? When we turn our eyes inward on our own hearts, and see there the ruins of many, many broken resolutions, and the dark and deep stains which passion and frivolity, and the world, and the beginnings of many crimes have left on our undying souls, how is it possible that we should not promise ourselves, in our intervals of serious reflection, that we will turn from evil to good? It is but the spontaneous and, I had almost said, irrepressible effort of an awakened mind to put itself into an attitude to begin obedience to the dictates of reason and conscience, and the requisitions of a just and holy God. The worst men need not make themselves worse than they are; even they have their intervals of serious reflection. Amidst all its seeming thoughtlessness, amidst all its real degradation, the human heart still yearns for better things, aspires to better things, promises itself better things. We cannot help these promises, if we would; we ought not to try to suppress them, if we could: but we should concentrate our whole moral strength on the purpose to keep them.

Religion itself is not more exacting of us than we often are of ourselves. Were we to listen now to all the good resolutions we have at any time formed, all the clear, distinct, and solemn promises we have made to ourselves, we should find that nothing is required of us in the gospel, except to keep our own word. This wonderful consent and harmony between the Bible and the aspirations of the human soul in its best moods is, perhaps, to most minds the strongest, or at least the most convincing, evidence of the heavenly origin of both. There is nothing in the warnings and counsels of God which sounds strange or unfamiliar to our better nature, to the inner man. "For that which I do, I allow not: for what I would, that do I not; but what I hate, that do I. If then I do that which I would not, I consent unto the law that it is good." There is nothing which the teachings of Christ, or the example of holy and devout men, or the exhortations of loving friends call upon us to do or become, which many of us have not promised ourselves to do and become a hundred times. Where is our consistency, where is our self-respect, where is our reverence for truth, or our fear of God, that we should promise and not perform? May that grace, which alone is sufficient for us, turn our hearts anew to these promises, and help us to fulfil them! May that mercy which never faileth have pity and forgive, whenever we come short of it, from weakness and frailty, or the sudden and unforeseen stress of temptation! And, in the judgment of the last day, may we all find pardon and acceptance, not for our promises alone, but for our honest and unremitting endeavor to fulfil them in life and in death!

JESUS CHRIST MADE PERFECT THROUGH SUFFERINGS.

“For it became him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings.” — HEBREWS ii. 10.

THERE is so much sadness and mystery mingled in human life, that one is often tempted to think it well with those with whom it is well over. If innocence were a shield, if all the suffering in the world could be clearly seen to be retributive or corrective, the suffering would remain the same, it is true ; but it would not be so difficult to account for its being permitted under the divine administration. How can we account for the fact, that Jesus Christ, the purest and most exalted of the children of God, “the holy one,” should live a life of sorrow, and die at last prematurely to all human apprehension, and amidst torture and ignominy ?

The declaration in the text will help us to resolve this difficulty in the providence of the All-

Wise and the All-Good. Jesus suffered, it appears, that he might be made perfect.

Because a man suffers, it does not follow necessarily that his sufferings are to be regarded as a retribution for his sins, or as a means of correcting his sins, or that they are inflicted in consequence of his sins, or even that they imply in any way that he is, or has been, a sinner. He may be a good man already, one of the best of men, "unspotted from the world;" and yet he may suffer, not that he may be made good, but that he may be made better, that he may be made perfect.

So it was preëminently with Jesus Christ, whose sufferings had nothing to do with sin, but they led to higher degrees of moral and spiritual excellence and glory. Every trial he underwent had this design and tendency, to make him perfect; perfect in himself; perfect in his office as Mediator; perfect as an example to his followers. "For it became Him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings."

The sufferings of Jesus Christ were necessary, in the first place, to make him perfect in himself.

Affliction, it has often been said, is like fire; what it does not melt, it hardens. If trials and disappointments do not make a man visibly better, they are apt to make him visibly worse, by making him reckless, or by inducing a misanthropic temper, or perhaps a gloomy fatalism. As a general rule, however, it will not be denied that adversity makes men more thoughtful and considerate, and gives them juster views of human life, and quickens their sense of dependence on a higher Power. Some qualities especially, which yet are essential to a perfect character, — such, for example, as patient endurance, a submissive spirit, and magnanimous self-devotion, — are only to be acquired and exercised under the discipline of that stern and rigid nurse of human virtue.

And, in reasoning on this subject, we must not suppose that these means were less necessary to our Saviour than to others, for the full development of his mind and soul. Whatever views may be entertained of his relationship to the Divinity, all Christians agree that he had a human character; and this character was formed like that of his followers, gradually, by adding excellence to excellence, as circumstances or the occasion drew it forth. That our Lord differed from all others in being “without sin” from the beginning is admitted; but to confound mere sinlessness with absolute perfection, to suppose he was perfect from the beginning in the same sense in which he actually became so afterwards, would be to contradict the express teachings of the Evangelists, who represent his piety and virtue as a gradual acquisition. "The child," they say, "grew and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom; and the grace of God was upon him." And again, "Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." So much then is certain. If the Bible is to be believed, his character was formed gradually, like that of any other person; and depended, as we must presume, in the same sense, though not perhaps in the same degree, on discipline, and cultivation, and external influences. At any rate, his character appeared as occasion called it forth. Hence it follows, that if the discipline of adversity is necessary, as we have seen, to the perfect unfolding of the spiritual nature of "such as are saved," it was equally so to the perfect unfolding of the spiritual nature of him who is every where set forward as "the captain of their salvation."

In reading the accounts which the sacred writers give us of the life of our Lord, I think we can perceive the effect which his sufferings had on his character in making him more and more an object of veneration and holy trust. His first public acts were sometimes marked with a sternness and severity, and he sometimes expresses himself with an indignation, which we do not find amidst that subdued and serene submission and benignity which throw such a melancholy interest and grandeur around the closing scenes of his earthly labors and trials. Compare his conduct at the opening of his public ministry, when with a scourge of small cords he drove out the money changers and other traffickers who had intruded themselves into the precincts of the temple; and the manner when, at least in one instance, he turned round "in anger" to rebuke the obduracy of his countrymen; and also the woe upon woe which through a whole chapter he thundered on their vices and their hypocrisy, — compare, I say, his conduct in these instances with his conduct afterwards; with the tears he shed over the devoted city; with his last and most affecting interview with his disciples; with the manner in which he received the kiss of Judas, though he knew it was to betray him, and in which he bore himself at his trial, amidst the insults and mockery of his judges and the soldiery; above all, with his prayer on the cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." By studying the character of Jesus Christ under this single point of view, we shall see, I think, that it underwent a gradual change, and became more tender, more unearthly, more godlike under the afflictions he endured. Many qualities in his character which command our highest admiration, our deepest reverence, would have had no opportunity for exertion or manifestation, perhaps would not have existed, but for the sufferings which called them forth.

Besides, the constancy and moral sublimity, which our Lord could only have evinced under the severest trials, supply us with one of the strongest internal evidences of his miraculous character and the divinity of his mission. I am aware that the cross of Christ, notwithstanding the more than human magnanimity with which it was borne, created many doubts and difficulties even in the honest minds amongst his contemporaries; for they reasoned that, if he had really been the Son of God, God would not have given him over to such humiliation. But it was because they had associated with the expected Messiah the vulgar notions of greatness, and could not conceive of one as great who was not surrounded with the usual circumstances of greatness; the pomp and blazonry of earthly power and renown. With us, however, it is different. We know that the only true greatness is greatness of soul; and that the circumstances, whatever they may be, which have the effect to display the highest degree of this greatness, are those which vindicate a man's claim to real superiority. Let history tell of her hero who in the day of his triumph bestrode the world like a colossus, and was worshipped as a god; but when a reverse came on his fortunes, and he was hurled from the eminence he had occupied, where then was his glory, or the qualities by which it had been won? If Jesus Christ had merely been a successful adventurer, or a mighty conqueror, — another Solomon, or another Judas Maccabæus; another Alexander or Cæsar, — his ascendancy might easily be accounted for by natural causes. But when we look on him as an obscure Galilean, educated in all the prejudices of his country, unsustained by any of the excitements or illusions which do so much to bolster up the vulgar great; betrayed and forsaken by the few he had counted on as friends; left alone, absolutely alone, to watch the gathering of that black and portentous cloud which was soon to break in thunder on his naked head; and yet with a soul unshaken, unappalled, — well, indeed, may we exclaim with the Roman centurion, who witnessed his last sufferings, “Truly this was the Son of God!” Jesus Christ might have been great, as other men have been great, and it would have proved nothing; but the circumstances of extreme trial in which he was placed afforded him an opportunity for displaying a greatness to which there is no parallel; a greatness not more remarkable for its degree than for its entire originality. Every mind capable of profound thought will appreciate this argument for Christianity; because the entire originality of our Saviour's character makes it as much a miracle that the Evangelists, with all their prejudices, should have drawn it from the imagination, as that the character itself should have really existed for them to describe.

Again, the sufferings of Jesus were necessary in his character of Mediator, to be as a ground of mutual sympathy between him and his followers.

One of the principal reasons which make the idea of a Mediator so grateful to the human heart is, that with our frail and imperfect natures we can feel no proper sympathy with the mysterious and awful Power, the Infinite One, we wish to propitiate. Hence the deep and inextinguishable longing of humble and devout minds for some one of a like nature, between whom and us there can be something like a fellow-feeling, on whom our religious affections may repose, and who will intercede for us before the throne of that incomprehensible Being, to us unapproachable even in thought. The great purpose and benefit of a Mediator would be compromised and lost, if he were not a Mediator who could be touched, and who had been really touched, by a sense of our infirmities. Wherefore, to borrow the words of the apostle, "In all things it behoved him to be made like unto his brethren, so that as he himself hath suffered, being tempted, he is able to succor them that are tempted."

It is also this mutual sympathy, a sympathy growing out of a consciousness of common trials and sufferings, which gives to the example of our Lord almost all its applicability to human conduct. If he had been made in the nature of angels, if "in all things" he had not been made like unto his brethren, to be tried as they are tried, and to suffer as they suffer, we might be told what he did, but it would not follow that it was possible for us to do the same, or even that it was proper for us to aspire to do the same. If Jesus Christ were a superior being, he might be an example to superior beings like himself, but he would not be an example to men. The very idea of an example supposes not only that we ought to imitate it, but that we can imitate it; and, of course, that we possess in general the same powers and capacities with the person by whom it is set. If Jesus Christ were a superior being above all human sympathy, his very virtues would no more be an example to us in any proper sense of that word, than the flight of an eagle or the strength of an elephant is an example to us. The whole force and pertinency of the example of Jesus consists in supposing, that he was a sharer with us in the same dangers and sorrows, that he was tried as we are tried, that he suffered as we suffer, that he triumphed as we might triumph. Unless we begin by assuming this, his virtues, much as we may admire them, are no more an example to us than his miracles.

Add to this, that the sufferings of Jesus have given a peculiar cast to his religion, and fitted it permanently to become a religion of consolation. Go to the various religions of paganism, if you want a religion to fill and captivate the imagination with the fictions of a beautiful mythology. Go to the religion of Mohammed, if you want a religion merely to stir the blood of warriors and voluptuaries. Go to the religion of a Socrates or a Seneca, if you merely want a religion for sages and philosophers, in which to bewilder themselves in subtle and endless speculation. But if you want a religion to assuage human woe, and wipe away the starting tear, and light up even the darkness of the tomb with a light from heaven, go to that which was dispensed by one who was himself a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.

It is to this circumstance, I suppose, that we owe that vein of tender melancholy running through all his discourses, and his propensity to dwell on those topics which are most grateful to a bruised spirit, and also the fondness with which those who have neglected his religion in prosperity often turn to it, and cling to it, in the dark hour of peril or bereavement. Again, we submit more readily to be advised and consoled by one who has felt the same or a similar distress, because we know that he can enter fully into all our feelings, and will make allowance for the infirmities of which he has been painfully conscious in his own person; and because he has a peculiar right to insist on a submission and constancy which he has himself so signally displayed. It is to the suffering Jesus much more than to the triumphant Jesus, to his cross much more than to his crown, that the bowed spirit of an afflicted race turns with hope and trust.

What, then, is the practical use of these observations?

They teach us, in the first place, that we ought never to question or doubt the justice or benignity of the Supreme Disposer in permitting the sufferings which Jesus endured. These sufferings, we have seen, were necessary to carry out the great purposes of his mission; and of course the same wisdom and mercy which prompted the mission sanctioned also the means by which alone it could be made effectual. On the part of our Saviour himself, too, the same pure and expansive benevolence, which led him to assume his high and responsible office, made him willing also meekly to acquiesce in the sacrifices it required.

Let us rather learn, from the sufferings of Jesus, the meekness and constancy with which the chastisements of God are to be borne by all. We greatly err, if we imagine that our Lord's pain and misery were in any sense less real or less exquisite than the pain and misery of others, or that he had supports other than those which are open to us, — an approving mind, and reliance on the Divinity. The same angel which was sent to strengthen him is sent to strengthen us, if we ask for it aright. Having therefore the same consolations and supports, let it be our constant endeavor to bear the ills and sorrows of life with the same composure and dignity, and the same entire acquiescence in the will of the Supreme. After considering the sufferings of Jesus, we certainly cannot think it a strange thing that we also should be afflicted; rather let us remember that, if we suffer with Jesus, we shall also reign with him. And is it too much to expect from the afflicted, even while the hand of God is heavy upon them, to feel that the sufferings of this life are not worthy to be compared with the glory to be revealed in those who continue faithful to the end?

Let us then reflect often on the sufferings of Jesus, and ponder them well ; and especially when in the presence, as now, of the symbols intended to commemorate these sufferings, and the undying love with which they were borne, and of which they tell. We should do so that it may increase our faith, and fill us with gratitude towards him who is the resurrection and the life. Above al', we should do it that we may catch something of that spirit of constancy and self-devotion, which could say, "Father, not as I will, but as thou wilt ;" "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." "For consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds. Have ye forgotten the exhortation which speaketh unto you as unto children, My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him ; for whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth."

HE KNEW WHAT WAS IN MAN.

“For he knew what was in man.” — JOHN ii. 25.

THERE are two kinds of knowledge which are often confounded together: a knowledge of the world, and a knowledge of human nature; a knowledge of men as they are, and a knowledge of men as they might be; a knowledge of what man has put forth, and a knowledge of what is in man, to be put forth if he would.

Knowledge of the world, or of men as they are, supposes one to be conversant with affairs, with the shifts and turns of fortune, and with the various humors of men. It can hardly be acquired in much perfection except by large and frequent commerce with society, by mixing with all sorts of people in all sorts of ways. This kind of knowledge, if possessed in an eminent degree, fits one to get on in the world. It makes what is called a good business man, and is more essential, perhaps, than any other quality to success in public life. It is also important to some forms of literary success. A writer or speaker, to be immediately and generally popular, must be thoroughly imbued with the prevailing opinions and sentiments, and not much in advance of them;—a little in advance of them, perhaps, that he may be looked up to as an authority; but not much in advance of them, lest he should lose the public sympathy, or fail to be understood. Even the popular statesman differs from others chiefly in this, that he can see what the multitude are going to think and do a little sooner than they can themselves; and thus is often in a condition to take ground a little in advance of the public opinion of to-day, in the assurance that it will be sustained by the public opinion of to-morrow.

But this knowledge of the world, or of men as they are, however important and necessary, is often found to exist in great perfection in persons who have but little knowledge of human nature properly so called; that is to say, of what is in man, to be put forth if he would,—of what is latent in man. And, as they have but little knowledge of it, they commonly have but little faith in it.

Jesus Christ, “in whom were hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge,” “knew all men, and needed not that any should testify of man, for he knew what was in man." He knew at the same time what was in the world, and what was in human nature ; man as he was, and man as he might be.

His knowledge of the world, of the ways of men, of men as they are, appeared in all his intercourse with the men of his day, — penetrating at a glance the half-formed purpose or thought of friend or foe. Though surrounded from the beginning by powerful and subtle enemies who were continually plotting his destruction, he was never, in a single instance, taken by surprise. Even when he went up to Jerusalem for the last time, he knew what awaited him there ; he went up because his time had come. And this knowledge was necessary. In much of his conduct, and to a certain extent even in his mode of teaching, and in his teaching itself, it was necessary that he should understand and adapt himself to the ways of the world around him, to the habits and prejudices of the people with whom he had to deal.

But a more difficult and more profound knowledge than this was also required to fit him to become the Great Teacher ; a teacher not of the Jews alone, but of all mankind ; not of one age only, but all ages. To fulfil his high mission as the Divine Word to man, it was necessary that he should know what is in man, and all that is in man, though much of it had never before found adequate utterance; nay, had never before been revealed to the consciousness of any living being. He knew what was in man; as well what had not been put forth, as what had been put forth. He addressed himself not merely to the men he saw around him, to the actual man, but also to the possible man. He knew the immeasurable capacities and resources which were latent in man. And this it was which qualified him to legislate for all nations and all ages. Hence also it is, that, so long as man continues to be man, his religion will continue to meet the wants and be adapted to the condition of man. It will never become obsolete; it will never grow old: it will be "the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

That our Lord "knew what was in man" appears, first, in the doctrines which he taught; and, secondly, in the means by which he would have them established and propagated in the world.

In the first place, look at the doctrines which he taught. And here I speak, as my text actually leads me to do, of the doctrines which he taught respecting man. The doctrines respecting man, which may be said to be in some sense original with Christ and peculiar to him, are these three: First, that duty in man consists not in an outward conformity to prescribed rules, but in an inward and strict fidelity to great principles. Secondly, that true greatness in man consists not in wealth or station, nor even in intellectual gifts, but in public service and in dignity and elevation of soul. And lastly, that the secret of the highest form of influence over man is found, not by acting on his self-love or his fears, but by overcoming evil with good.

No doubt the narrow and worldly-minded Jews, when they first listened to inculcations like these, were tempted to regard them as the extravagances of a young and inexperienced reformer who did not know what he was about. But it was by falling into the error mentioned above ; it was by mistaking a knowledge of what is in the world for a knowledge of what is in human nature. The great prophet of the new dispensation was able to see through, at a glance, the sevenfold disguises of worldly prejudice and worldly habit. Underneath all this he saw what was in man ; he saw there the elements of a new obedience, the elements of a higher form of moral, social, and spiritual life, which the ancient civilizations, whether Jewish or pagan, had not awakened or recognized, but which it was his mission to appeal to and call forth.

Take, for example, the first of the doctrines above mentioned ; namely, that duty consists not in an outward conformity to prescribed rules, but in faithfulness to great principles. We question not the wisdom or the necessity of governing the childhood of the world, as children are governed now, by outward rules arbitrarily imposed and blindly followed. And no evil is likely to ensue in such cases; for the same authority that imposes the rule can modify it, from time to time, to suit the exigency; and the modification will be accepted with the same trustful and blind acquiescence as the rule itself. But as society advances, and the human mind is unfolded more and more, man gradually passes from this state of pupilage, making it necessary that he should be governed in another manner. He is now able to understand not only the rule, but the reason or principle of the rule; and hence becomes responsible not merely for his obedience to this or that received rule, but also in some sense for the soundness of the rule itself, or at least for its right application in particular instances. In one word, he is no longer under a schoolmaster as in the primitive times, but under Christ, who has said, "Henceforth I call you not servants, for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth; but I have called you friends, for all things that I have heard of my Father I have made known to you."

Compare the decalogue, which constitutes the basis of the morality of the Old Testament, with the beatitudes which constitute the basis of the morality of the New; and you will readily understand what I mean by the distinction between a morality of dead rules and a morality of living principles. "Blessed are the merciful;" "blessed are the peace-makers;" "blessed are the pure in heart." Here no unbending formula is prescribed. We are not commanded to do this or that particular thing, — to force through, for instance, a particular measure without regard to circumstances or consequences; but the disposition, the inward principle, is indicated from which we are always to act; the way, the means, being left to be determined by an enlightened Christian conscience in view of all the circumstances and foreseen consequences of the act. It is a law, but it is a "law of liberty." We are not treated as slaves, nor yet as children, but as the Lord's freemen. The spirit, the reason, the principle of the law is given, and it is left for us to consider, under the light of the gospel, and under a solemn sense of our responsibility to God, in what way this principle can best be carried into effect in the condition in which we are placed. And the excellency of this wisdom consists herein: as the reason of the law is better understood, as the principle of the law unfolds itself in the individual and in society more and more, its form rises to meet it, becomes clothed with a higher significance; and thus, as I have said before, never becomes obsolete, but renews itself, and reaffirms itself at every step of human progress.

The same is also true of the second Christian doctrine, above mentioned; namely, that greatness consists not in wealth or station, nor yet in intellectual superiority, but in public service, and in dignity and elevation of soul. We must expect that a man will be called great in any community according as he excels in those particular qualities which are held there in the highest account. Hence, among savages the great man is a man of gigantic strength and stature; among a warlike people the great warrior is the great man; in proportion as the civic virtues come to be appreciated and honored, the great statesman begins to be looked up to as a great man; if intellect is the standard, the great thinker; if usefulness and integrity, — the public benefactor, the moral hero. Thus we see that, as civilization advances, human greatness is determined by a continually ascending scale; and what I wish to impress upon you here is, that Christianity began by taking this scale at the highest.

over them, and they that exercise authority upon them are called benefactors. Let it not be so with you; but he that is greatest among you, let him be as the younger, and he that is chief as he that doth serve." He who spoke thus must have known not only what mankind had become, but what they were capable of becoming; and also by what means they were to be led on. He knew that the first thing to be done was to hold up before them the idea of true greatness. The idea, the conception, must go before the reality. For a while the light shone in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not. But the darkness never entirely extinguished the Christian idea of true greatness. Nothing is more remarkable of what are called by way of distinction the Dark Ages, than the inconsistency, the contradiction, between what the Christians of that time really were and what in moments of high spiritual exaltation they aspired to be; in one word, between the moral practice and the moral thought in that benighted period of the Christian world. By means of the Scriptures, sacred hymns, and the symbols of the Church, the idea of what God required still lived. Over the confusion and license and ferocity which prevailed, there still hovered a conception of the true Christian life, to command the respect and win the love of all, and slowly and silently to draw all men unto it.

Again, the third and last of the above-mentioned Christian doctrines — namely, that the secret of the highest form of influence over man is found, not in interest or fear, but in self-devotion and love, in overcoming evil with good — is equally in accordance with a profound knowledge of what is in man. In taking this stand we do not shut our eyes on the many weaknesses, follies, and extravagances which have been and still are recommended and practised under fanatical notions of devotion and self-sacrifice. Nevertheless we must not abandon an important and sound principle from disgusts occasioned by the misunderstandings or exaggerations to which it has sometimes led, or by the ill-repute into which the principle itself has sometimes fallen in consequence. It is still true that love has more power over man, to induce real and lasting change, than either hope or fear. I have no doubt that Christianity has done much good through its distinct and authoritative annunciation of a future life ; but it is a mistake to suppose that this is the sole, or the chief, secret of its influence. Its peculiar and distinctive excellence and power do not grow out of its being a new revelation of God's omnipotence, nor yet of his justice, but of his love. Its doctrine is, "God is love; and he that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him." "Therefore, if thine enemy hunger, feed him ; if he thirst, give him drink : for in so doing thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head. Be not overcome of evil, but overcome evil with good."

Strange that the professed followers of Jesus should be so slow to find out what is so clearly laid down as being at the bottom of all genuine Christian influence. But they are beginning to find it out at last, and to reap the fruit of the discovery, in the wonderful success attending those attempts to reclaim the erring and lift up the fallen, where men trust wholly to the accents of human sympathy, speaking in the name of him who loved us and gave himself for us. Moral miracles might still be wrought, if men would only have faith in that ever open and ever flowing source of Divine power. "For I am persuaded, that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

Finally, that our Lord "knew what was in man" appears not only in his doctrines, but also in the means by which he would have them established and propagated in the world.

The history of Christianity, read by one who mistakes a knowledge of the world for a knowledge of human nature, presents an inexplicable enigma. Go back to the day of the crucifixion; follow the feeble and fainting steps of the Victim as he passes through the streets of Jerusalem on his way to Calvary; witness the scene of torture and ignominy which followed. Is this the King that was promised? Is this his coronation? All experience, all history, all our affections answer, "It is." To a suffering and not to a triumphant Christ the thoughts of a tempted, perplexed, and sorrowing race instinctively turn. It is the memory of that love which was stronger than death, mingled with the consciousness that the sacrifice had become necessary to our reconciliation with God, that has enthroned the Crucified One for ever in the heart of man. What is there in mere worldly greatness to be followed by results like these? What care we at this day for Herod the Great, or Alexander the Great? It is one of the eternal laws of nature, that every thing which is personal and selfish perishes; that only which contributes to the spread of light, and the progress of truth and virtue, endures.

There are three ways in which a religion can be established and propagated;—by force, by authority, or by individual conviction and heart-felt love. The first two are ever likely to recommend themselves to those who mistake a knowledge of the world for a knowledge of human nature, because the outward success attending them is more immediate and more apparent. Thus we see Mohammed and his successors, the scimitar in one hand and the Koran in the other, with the stern and brief argument, "Believe or die!" But is this the way to win souls? Again, after the great Christian apostasy, the Church opposed and exalted itself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped; and began to claim for human authority what is only due to the Divine. Men were called upon to consent to be blindly led. Was this the way to bring about an inward and moral change? The only righteousness which the gospel accepts, or knows, is the righteousness that is by faith, the righteousness that has its root in personal conviction, the righteousness that proceeds, not from a blind and slavish assent to what is said to be true, but from a knowledge, acceptance, and love of what is felt to be true.

Thus it is that real Christianity has spread. Hence also, I may add, the explanation, at least in part, of a difficulty which troubles many minds. I mean the fact that the progress of real Christianity has been so slow, and that so much still remains to be done before its triumph is complete. Christianity is not a mere development of human nature; it is a divine element communicated to that nature, by which the nature itself is to be renewed and transfigured. It is not the nature itself, but is intended to act on it; still its action must be in accordance with the laws of that nature, and also in proportion as the nature itself is developed in obedience to those laws. The divine seed is planted; the result is to be not a mechanical displacing of the parts, but a living growth; and growth requires time. Therefore it is that God waits; therefore it is that the Saviour waits; and we also must labor and wait, until the tree takes deep root, until it sends out its boughs unto the sea, and its branches unto the river, and fills the whole earth.

We have now seen how entirely and profoundly the gospel is adjusted to human nature, both in its moral teachings and in the manner of its action and success. Two general remarks must sum up what we have to add by way of application.

In the first place, we find in the doctrine of this discourse a striking confirmation of the divine origin of Christianity. We have shown that its Founder understood human nature better than any philosopher of antiquity, and knew how to mould this nature to his purposes better than any lawgiver or statesman of antiquity. The question is therefore forced upon us: "Whence hath this man all this wisdom?" It is idle to talk about training and discipline ; for he had neither : and, besides, any instruction he might have received in this way would only have had the effect to give his mind a more decidedly Jewish or Oriental bent, and so have been fatal to that breadth and universality of view on which, as I have said, his chief distinction and glory depend. Neither is it to any purpose to say, that we have no measures by which to determine beforehand what unassisted genius can do. I grant this, but with one important and necessary qualification. We must confine the remark to what properly pertains to genius ; to poetry for example, to some of the forms of eloquence, or at most to native sagacity ; but this makes it inapplicable in the present case. For we find here what we are accustomed to expect only as the result, not of genius, but of profound study, and wide and various observation. True, we have no means of ascertaining precisely how far the unassisted forces of the human mind might enable an individual to go in any direction. For example ; if the attention of a savage were accidentally turned to the study of the heavens, we cannot tell precisely how far he would be competent to master the rudiments of astronomy. But one thing is certain ; he never would be able to produce such a work as the “Principia” of Newton. Yet even this would feebly represent the marvel to be explained, when we are told that a Galilean peasant not only undertook to legislate for the conduct of all ages and countries, but succeeded so well as to leave not a single error to be corrected, and not a single defect to be supplied.

Finally, if Christianity is so nicely adjusted to human nature as has been shown, it follows that whoever puts himself in contradiction to it, puts himself in contradiction to his own nature. You blame the drunkard, not only because he has violated the laws of his country and the laws of God, but because he has violated the laws of his own physical nature. Now we all have a moral and spiritual nature to consult and provide for as well, dependent also on our observing its eternal and unalterable laws; which laws it is the mission of the gospel, as we have seen, to inculcate and enforce. If this be so, then whoever disowns or neglects the gospel, disowns and neglects his own proper nature; refuses to accept that peace of soul to which he might aspire, by refusing to submit to the conditions on which alone that peace can be built. All that the gospel requires of us is, that we should be true to our own nature; but in order to be so we must accept those principles which alone are able to reach, arouse, and call forth the inmost elements of that nature, — elements, however, which are essential to the highest form of the soul's life. The perfect Christian is neither more nor less than the perfect man. Hence the language of Divine Wisdom is ever the same: "Whoso findeth me findeth life, and shall obtain favor of the Lord. But he that sinneth against me wrongeth his own soul: all that hate me love death."

XII.

SPIRITUAL DISCERNMENT

“But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.” — 1 CORINTHIANS ii. 14.

BY what means and faculties can man become acquainted with the realities of the spiritual life and the spiritual world, and know them, and be affected by them, as realities? We learn from the text that “the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.” But what is this spiritual discernment? Why is “the natural man” incapable of it? What are the changes he must undergo, in order to become capable of it?

These are the questions which I now propose to take up, and, if possible, to resolve; and this, too, on the basis of a general doctrine, which is at once rational, and Scriptural, and eminently practical.

The general doctrine to which I refer is, that every kind of knowledge supposes a mind prepared to receive it, and this preparation of mind may be regarded as the appropriate and indispensable condition of such knowledge.

Let me illustrate what I mean, at considerable length, beginning with the simplest and most elementary kind of knowledge, that which we obtain by means of the senses, — external perception. As all knowledge begins here, it might be presumed that it requires no preparation ; in other words, that what one man can see, all can see, that what one man can hear, all can hear. But it is far otherwise. A large proportion of what we know by external perception, we know by what is called acquired perception ; so much so, that, if a man were now created with all his senses in their entire physical development, they would be at first of but little or no service to him as knowing faculties. He would still have to learn how to see, how to hear, and even how to feel, in order to distinguish and know ; and his capacity to distinguish and know in this way would be in proportion as his senses were educated up to it. How much more a blind man can distinguish and know by hearing alone than other men ! How much more an artist can see in a picture or landscape than the unpractised and unskilful eye ! It is not that the senses themselves are different, or more perfectly developed ; but because the mind, through changes which it has itself undergone, is able to recognize, in what is manifested to the senses, a new significance.

So likewise in respect to that form of knowledge which goes under the name of common sense, as if it were common to all men, and the same in all. But here, too, in point of fact, it is far otherwise. Common sense, in the usual acceptation of that term, comprehends two elements : first, the primitive judgments of the human mind, for which, as the name denotes, the mind can have no other evidence except that which it finds in itself ; and, secondly, such generally received deductions from experience as have taken the form of maxims, and in this form are adopted and transmitted without question as the common heritage. Now even in respect to the primitive judgments, considered as actual knowledge, we cannot say that they are either common to all, or the same in all ; for we must make a distinction between principles of knowledge and a knowledge of these principles. Because there are truths which the mind knows at once, when it is sufficiently developed to know them at all, it does not follow that every mind is sufficiently developed (for example, in infancy or in extreme barbarism) to know them at all. And this is still more obvious as regards the other element of common sense, the maxims deduced from experience. Evidently there was a time when these maxims were in process of formation, and when of course they had not as yet been incorporated into the common sense of any people. Hence we are not surprised to find that the common sense of savages is a very different thing from the common sense of civilized men; and, furthermore, that it is essentially modified by the kind of civilization which prevails. For example, the common sense of the Chinese is not the same with that of the English or the French.

This, then, is our conclusion even in respect to the earliest and simplest steps in human intelligence: they all depend on a previous preparation of mind; this previous preparation of mind being an indispensable condition of the knowledge, — wanting which, the knowledge fails.

The general doctrine gains in clearness and impressiveness when applied to the more advanced and complicated efforts of science and the arts. In the infancy of society, in the early stages of human progress, the steps were short and simple, consisting for the most part of a single thought turned to some single and special purpose; these, therefore, might have been suggested to one, almost as well as to another, if placed in like favorable circumstances. But it is far otherwise

now. At the present day we may discover or invent things over again; but, to take a step really in advance, we must begin by mastering what has been done before by the best minds in the same field of inquiry: and this, too, not merely that we may be in a condition to solve the new problem, but that we may be in a condition even so much as to accost it, or comprehend it. I know how common it is to refer some of the most important discoveries and inventions even in modern times to casual events, to a hint dropped unawares, to a transient glimpse vouchsafed the favored aspirant; as if the whole depended on accident, or at best on a kind of inspiration, which as it happens to one might happen to all. But no such thing. It was not the swinging of a lamp in the cathedral of Pisa, nor the falling of an apple in the garden at Woolsthorpe, but the fact that the first was observed by a Galileo, and the second by a Newton, which has made them so fruitful of consequences in the history of science. The hint is nothing, except to those who are in a condition to take it and unfold it. Accident may do a little towards determining the time when, and the place where of a great discovery, but the discovery itself must come from the mind of the discoverer; that is to say, from the fact that his mind has been previously educated up to a level with the problem to be solved.

Thus far I have spoken of acts of the pure intellect; but the illustrations of the doctrine most in point are drawn from those acts of the intellect which are blended with feeling; as in matters of taste and conscience. Here a twofold preparation is necessary, a preparation of the head and the heart: we must know in order to feel, and we must feel in order to know; which requires that we should be in a condition to do both.

Take, for example, æsthetic sentiment, or what is sometimes called taste, meaning thereby the faculty to know and appreciate what is sublime or beautiful in Nature and art. I do not deny that the germs of this faculty are innate, or that, in various proportions, they are common to all men, making part of what constitutes the essential distinction between the human and the animal mind even in its undeveloped state. Still it is only in proportion as the faculty itself is developed in the human mind, either by growth, or experience, or culture, that it can be expected to manifest itself in the life of the individual. An undeveloped faculty is not a faculty in use, but only in prospect, the possibility of a faculty: it does not speak of what a man can do as he is, but only of what he might be made capable of doing.

Hence there is no inconsistency in saying that man may have so little of his proper humanity developed, as to be almost as incapable of appreciating the works of Raphael or Mendelssohn as the inferior animals. Like them, as regards what is sublime or beautiful in such works, seeing he would see, but not perceive; and hearing he would hear, but not understand.

And here it is to no purpose to object, that the simpler forms of beauty, a simple air in music, for instance, is understood by one as well as by another. For, in the first place, this is true in respect to those communities only which are more or less advanced in civilization; and besides, even where it is true, the doctrine resolves itself, after all, into a question of degrees merely. It shows, what indeed might have been taken for granted, that less culture is necessary in order to understand and enjoy simple forms of beauty than such as are complicated and refined; and, furthermore, that this degree of culture needs not be above that which is common or universal in a particular community. But because this degree of culture happens to be common or universal in a particular community, it does not follow that it ceases to be culture; so that the objection falls to the ground. It is still just as true as it was before, that some degree of culture is indispensable to the knowledge and appreciation of what is beautiful in nature or art.

The same is also true of conscience or the moral sense. There can be no doubt that man is constituted a moral being: that is to say, his moral judgments and feelings are not a factitious or accidental creation, the work of government, or education, or self-interest. Though stimulated and unfolded by influences from without, it is always in accordance with an innate and internal law — a law of his own nature. This law may be said to be “written in his heart;” so that, failing all other law, he would become “a law unto himself.” But this law takes effect in the case of this or that individual in so far only as his moral nature, which determines it, is developed; and his moral nature, like his physical or intellectual nature, is developed gradually, step by step. Thus is laid a foundation for the possibility and the necessity of moral progress in individuals, and in whole communities. It is not merely or mainly that men should become more conscientious, meaning thereby more observant of what conscience dictates; but conscience itself must become more tender, more enlightened, more discriminating: it must dictate a higher and purer morality. We are wont to speak of our Puritan ancestors as eminently conscientious; and so they were. With all their errors in doctrine, and all their faults in manner and temper, they were probably more strictly conscientious — that is, lived more strictly according to their convictions of duty — than any other people who can be named. Nevertheless they could countenance not only slavery as an existing institution, which is done by many good men now, but the slave trade; nay, some of the best of them scrupled not to engage, directly or indirectly, in that nefarious traffic. And the reason is obvious. They did not and they could not see such conduct in the moral light in which we see it; partly because this particular subject had not as yet been cleared up, as it has been since, by discussion; and partly because their general conception of human rights was less just and comprehensive than that which prevails at the present day: to which must be added what has been gained to public sentiment from the humanizing influence of a progressive Christian civilization.

Let me not be misunderstood. I neither say nor mean, that the notion of right in itself, of right as such, differs in different places, at different times, with different men. Men do not differ as to the regard which is due to right, as right. All men — that is, all men whose moral nature has begun to be developed ever so imperfectly — agree in this, that they ought to do what is right. But they differ on the question what is right; a question the solution of which does not depend, like the preceding, merely on their having a moral nature, but on the manner and degree of its development. Moreover this doctrine affords no color of pretence for doubting the reality of moral distinctions; that is to say, for insinuating that there is no such thing as right independently of our opinion of right. You might just as well maintain that there is no such thing as truth, because men, though they agree in their notion of truth itself, differ on the question, what is true. The doctrine, as here laid down, merely supposes that our moral, as well as our intellectual, faculties are capable of being enlightened, improved, and enlarged. In other words, because man, in a high state of moral progress, sees at once, and, as he is apt to think, intuitively, a particular action or class of actions to be right or wrong, it does not follow that he could have done the same at the beginning or lower state of his moral progress. I say could, and not would; for it is not enough to say of a man who has made but little moral progress, that he does not see difficult and refined moral distinctions: he cannot see them; that is, he cannot, until his moral nature is educated up to a level with the moral question proposed; or, in other words, until the eye, as well as the object, is given to him.

One word more in this connection. Theorists are fond of seeking the ultimate test of morals; and some have thought to find it in intuitions of reason, others in instinctive feelings, others in expediency, and others in the will of God. But make the ultimate test of morals what you will, it does not alter the fact as to the immediate or proximate test, which is the conscience of the individual; and this, again, is not an absolute or even a fixed standard, but varies with the moral progress of the individual from day to day; nay, is neither more nor less than the measure and expression of this progress for the time being.

I have been purposely slow in my approaches to the proper doctrine of this discourse; namely, the incompetency of unspiritual men to apprehend and appreciate spiritual truth. My reason for taking this course has been, that in respect to the high inculcations of the gospel the office of the preacher, as I understand it, is not so much to prove the truth of these inculcations, for their truth is supposed to be conceded, at least by Christians, to whom alone they are addressed; but rather to prepare and dispose his hearers to receive the truths in question in their full significance, by showing how they are to be reconciled and coördinated with all other truths; by showing, in short, how entirely they fall in with the whole of human experience. We have seen it to be a universal law of human intelligence, that it should be gradual, successive, step by step. No matter whether it be a question of common sense or the highest science ; no matter whether it be a question of expediency, or of taste, or of morals, — we are not in a condition to pronounce upon it, until our minds by growth, or experience, or training are raised to a level with it. And in the case of taste and morals, where knowledge takes the form of sentiment, where we must love in order to know, as well as know in order to love, — in all such cases, including of course piety, religion, the preparation required is not merely a preparation of the intellect, but also a preparation of heart and life. This is the general, the universal law ; and the text does but inculcate a single, though the highest, application of this law when it tells us, that “ the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him ; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.”

To return, then, to the questions proposed at the opening of this discourse ; if asked, in the first place, what constitutes spiritual discernment ; what gives the power of spiritual discernment ? — I answer, in one word, — spiritual experience. Spiritual experience supposes, of course, the excitement and activity of the spiritual faculties, more or less of spiritual culture or growth, some degree of spiritual progress ; and our actual capacity of knowledge, or of living faith, in spiritual things depends on the degree of this progress. “ Oh taste and see that the Lord is good ! ” exclaimed the Hebrew psalmist three thousand years ago ; for it was as well understood then by heavenly minded men as it is now, that we cannot apprehend spiritual truth through the experience of others, but only through our own. And again, “ Jesus answered them and said, My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself.” This and a multitude more of our Saviour’s precepts clearly teach, that what is called spiritual insight depends much less on intellectual gifts, or intellectual culture, or learning of any kind, than on the state of the affections and our whole moral being. The same views were also inculcated and insisted on by his immediate followers. Thus, in the chapter from which the text is taken, we are expressly told that “ the deep things of God ” are revealed through his Spirit. “ For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man which is in him ? Even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God. Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God ;

that we might know the things that are freely given to us of God." The apostle's meaning here would seem to be, that it is only through the agency of what is divine in our own regenerated nature that we are put into communication with the Divinity, and made capable of apprehending divine things. In other words, properly to know God, we must be in sympathy with him; we must have a portion at least of his Spirit. Accordingly we are exhorted to follow "holiness, without which," as it is expressly said, "no man shall see the Lord;" nay, the Scriptures call upon us, in so many words, to become "partakers of his holiness," clearly implying that sympathy and participation in divine things must precede a proper knowledge, that is to say a living sense, of divine things.

If then we are asked, in the second place, why "the natural man" is incapable of such knowledge; why he is incapable of spiritual discernment, properly so called? — the answer, again, is plain. It is because he has not put himself into a real, that is to say a living, communication with spiritual things. He is incapable of this knowledge, because he has not as yet put himself into a real and living communication with the objects of this knowledge. By "the natural man," in this connection, we understand the opposite to the spiritual man. The natural man is the unspiritual man.

It is not necessary that he should be addicted to atrocious crimes, or sunk in sensuality, or destitute of refinement, or intelligence, or worldly prudence; it is enough if he is unspiritual. He is, in the strictest sense of that word, a worldly man; one who looks not beyond or above the present world for his motives, encouragements, and consolations; one in whom the spiritual elements of his nature are not as yet awakened; and one, therefore, who neither feels nor recognizes his spiritual capacities, or his spiritual relations. This is "the natural man"; and, after what has been said, it is obvious that his incapacity of spiritual discernment results from his not being in a condition to know the things of the Spirit in the only way in which they can be known,—by actual experience, by personal consciousness. There is no miracle, no mystery here. It is what happens every day in analogous cases not immediately connected with religion, where men show themselves incapable of understanding parts of their own nature as developed in others, if they have not also been developed in themselves. Thus the man of facts cannot understand the man of imagination, nor the man of imagination the man of facts; the miser cannot understand the philanthropist, nor the philanthropist the miser. Each is a puzzle, an extravagance, a foolishness to the other; merely because their natures, though the same in essence, are so differently developed that they cannot reason from consciousness to consciousness.

If then matters of taste and conscience cannot be understood or appreciated by men, except in proportion as their taste and conscience are unfolded, why wonder that the same law holds in the kindred subject of religion? Why wonder that religious or spiritual truths cannot be understood or appreciated as such, except in proportion as men's spiritual faculties are unfolded, meaning by spiritual faculties a spiritual consciousness; that is, a state of mind which makes men alive and awake to spiritual things, and puts what is divine in their own nature into communication with its Divine Source. And this is what I understand to be the apostle's teaching in the text. "The natural man"—that is, one in whom all sense of the spiritual and divine still slumbers—"receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him;" that is, they appear so to a mind which is the result of such experiences; "neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned,"—showing that the waking up of his own spiritual faculties is a necessary prerequisite.

Thus are we brought to the third and last question: What changes must the natural man undergo in order to become capable of spiritual discernment ! And to answer it aright we must guard against two opposite extremes, — the extreme of supposing that nothing depends on ourselves, and the extreme of supposing that every thing depends on ourselves. Our faculties are our own, and it depends on ourselves whether we use or abuse them, and also whether we cultivate or neglect them, for self-culture is eminently a personal act. But it does not depend on ourselves under what influences, from around and from above, all this takes place, — influences which in point of fact have so much to do in shaping our characters as well as our fortunes. It does not depend on ourselves under what religion we are born, or under what instructions or institutions we are brought up, or, to a certain extent, into what connections or companionships we are thrown. For this reason the wise and good man, after his greatest moral triumphs, will always be ready to exclaim : “ Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but to thy name give glory for thy mercy, and for thy truth’s sake.” Nevertheless it would seem that for us every thing has been done but man’s part. “ The day-spring from on high hath visited us,” the Holy Spirit is promised to every one who will open his heart to welcome the heavenly Visitant ; nothing more is required, even of the unregenerate, but to submit to the means, and co-operate in the work, of the great salvation.

The change in "the natural man," to which these means and this work look, and in which they are fulfilled, is the unfolding of his higher and better nature. The unspiritual man must become spiritual; he must bring out into activity and consciousness latent qualities of mind and heart; and then he will be in a condition to understand and feel the reality and the infinite worth of what strikes him perhaps as foolishness now. Nor has he any reason to despair of being able to do this. It is not as if the germs of the new life were not in him; they are in him, and only require to be unfolded and put forth. A humble sense of dependence and of his spiritual needs, the yearning of the soul after a better state of things, the prayer of faith, the various means which God has appointed, and the continual aids of his Holy Spirit will ensure the object. The change might be begun, and often is begun, in lisping infancy, through the power of a wise Christian nurture; it might be, and it sometimes is, carried on towards perfection in every step of advancing youth and manhood, through a life devoted from the beginning to the highest principles and the noblest objects. Oh, if from the cradle to the grave half as much pains were taken, or half as many appliances used, to bring out what is spiritual and divine in man as to bring out those qualities which pertain to worldly success, another day would dawn on this earth!

And his spiritual convictions and sensibilities will keep pace with his spiritual growth. To depend wholly or mainly on books, on nice and ingenious argumentation, on hearsay or authority, to clear up our doubts and difficulties in regard to the invisible things of God, is like seeking the living among the dead. A single earnest and hearty prayer, the actual putting forth of the spiritual life in deeds of benevolence and mercy, the living consciousness that we have become "partakers of the Divine nature," will do more to fill the soul with light and confidence, than years of unsanctified study. What is most wanted in order to still our doubts or dispel our perplexities in religion is, not that we may be convinced by argument of its reasonableness and abstract probability, but that we may be made to feel and know its reality from personal consciousness. I repeat it; the natural, the unspiritual man must become spiritual. His first satisfactory vision of heavenly things will be reflected back upon the depths of his own spiritual nature, excited, developed, regenerated by the power of the Christian faith. The Christian's doubts and difficulties on the subject of religion never trouble him when he is in his highest spiritual moods. And this is what our Saviour meant when he said in the passage which has been cited once before, "If any man will do his will, he will know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." He will have "the witness in himself." "There is," says one of the wisest and best of the old English divines, "there is a knowing of the truth as it is in Jesus, as it is in a Christ-like nature, as it is in that sweet, mild, humble, and loving spirit of Jesus, which spreads itself like a morning sun upon the souls of good men, full of light and life."

XIII.

PUBLIC OPINION.

"Carried about with every wind of doctrine." — EPHESIANS iv. 14.

OUR free political institutions, the general diffusion of knowledge, and the facilities, particularly through the newspaper press, for acting on whole communities at once, have had the effect gradually to introduce among us a new instrument of influence and reform ; or, at any rate, to clothe an old one with new power and activity. This instrument, I hardly need say, is Public Opinion.

In what I am going to say on this subject, let me not be understood to deny that public opinion, in its place and degree, is a legitimate principle and rule of human conduct. It is natural and fit that we should desire to stand well with our fellow-men. From our condition in society, and from the very constitution of our minds, it was obviously intended that we should be affected and determined, more or less, by praise and blame. Nor is this all. Public opinion, on all simple questions resting on a direct appeal to common sense and the moral sentiments, is generally right; at any rate, it is more likely to be so than the private opinion of interested parties. Look back on the history of human progress: almost every important step has been taken, not because the few advised it, but because the many demanded it. The history of reform in most countries is little else than the history of a series of concessions to public opinion. And so in other countries, even in the most despotic; for though in absolute governments there are no legal checks on the abuse of power, there is still the check of public opinion; to wit, a fear lest the people may be goaded into some desperate act. Then, too, the despot, at least if he lives within the pale of Christian civilization, cannot be wholly indifferent to the public opinion of other nations; he cannot help being restrained, more or less, by an unwillingness to incur the world's execration or contempt.

Some may object that conscience, enlightened by revelation, is the sole rule in the last appeal, and that to ask ourselves what the world will think, or say, is treason to this rule. But why so? With ordinary men, and in the ordinary course of things, what we call the individual conscience is little else than a reflection of the public conscience ; that is to say, of the public opinion of right. In such cases, therefore, the appeal to the public opinion of right is not necessarily an appeal from conscience to some other standard ; to that of expediency for example. It may be, and often is, an appeal from the uninstructed conscience of the individual to what is believed to be the better instructed conscience of the community ; the public sense of right. Exigencies sometimes arise, as I shall have occasion presently to show, when each one should follow his own conscience without regard to public opinion ; but, in the ordinary course of things, I cannot help thinking public opinion to be a safer rule than that conceit of private judgment, that extravagance of individualism, which it is now so much the fashion to recommend. Still, even here, you will observe, I do not suppose a man to defer to public opinion any further than his own conscience dictates ; so that, after all, he does but follow his own conscience in following the consciences of other men.

Thus much in favor of public opinion as a rule of conduct : it is still more important as a motive and sanction. When a man is tempted to commit a fraud, or to be guilty of any meanness or cruelty or excess, his own conscience protests against it ; and this alone ought to restrain him : often, however, we know it does not. Happily, in most cases public opinion protests as well ; and the same person who is not restrained by his own sense of the wrong, or by a fear of self-condemnation, is restrained by a fear of disgrace, or of public condemnation. In other words, he does not stand so much in awe of his own conscience as he does of the consciences of other men. After all, however, the motive from which he acts is often at least of the nature of a moral motive : he is afraid of moral disapprobation ; he stands in awe of the collective conscience of the community, which he looks up to as sanctioning and reënforcing his own conscience. For let me impress it upon you, that, when any one is restrained from wrong-doing by the public opinion of right as such, he is still restrained by conscience ; that is, the public conscience : “ Conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other.”

How little the best of us are in a condition to spare the restraints of public opinion, as a safeguard to morals and decency, appears from the effect it almost always has on the principles and habits even of good men, if they move into a neighborhood where a lower standard of public opinion prevails ; or where, as in the case of new and border settlements, no effective public opinion has as yet been organized ; or where the individual from any cause has reason to think himself unknown or unobserved. I speak not now of a few exceptional cases, of here and there one who seems born to influence others without being influenced by them in return. I speak of mankind as they arise, including what are called the better classes: I say of men in general, that in every tolerably constituted society they help to hold each other up. I am aware how apt public opinion is to be perverted or warped on single points. For example; in almost every community there are certain antiquated and widespread abuses, which the public opinion of that community, from prejudice or superstition or interest, is still disposed to uphold or connive at. Nevertheless, even there, on the great majority of topics in morals and humanity, public opinion is almost sure to be in advance of what men would be if left to themselves. Imperfect as public opinion is, there is not one man in ten thousand, whom a fear of offending it does not make more circumspect in many respects than he otherwise would be; more anxious not merely to appear, but also to be, worthy of public confidence.

And besides, why insist on what cannot be? Theorists may declaim, as they will, about the duty and the safety of disregarding public opinion as a practical principle, but a single glance at the actual working of the social constitution will show that, even with the theorists themselves, theory is one thing and practice another. No sane man ever did or ever will live in society, and yet be wholly indifferent to the opinion of society; for, however much he may be at issue with society on some points, he is never at issue with it in such a sense as to cast off all regard to appearances. The martyr, on his way to the stake, is not content with being sincere and brave; he would appear so, and live as such in the memory and speeches of men. And why not? Why not wish to stand well before the sense of right in other men, as we would before the sense of right in ourselves, or in God?

Let me, therefore, repeat what I said in the beginning: — public opinion has its legitimate place as a rule and sanction of human conduct, even in matters of right and wrong. Private conscience is not an absolute or all-sufficient rule, to the exclusion or neglect of the public conscience; much less is it of the nature of a protest against the public conscience. If it were so, where would be found that unity in men's moral judgment on which law is founded, and without which society could not exist?

Still it by no means follows that there is no occasion for the warning in the text, "that we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro, and carried about by every wind of doctrine.' The character of the trimmer and time-server, whether from selfish notions or from mere weakness, is so odious, and of so frequent occurrence in modern society, that we can hardly be too much on our guard against the danger of which the Apostle speaks.

How then is this danger to be averted? How is it possible to pay a proper regard to public opinion, without allowing it to become inordinate,—a snare to our own integrity, to all manly independence and stability of purpose?

In the first place, we are to make sure that what we take for public opinion is public opinion;—a much more difficult thing to do than is commonly supposed. The writers and talkers constitute but a small minority of any community; yet we are very apt to reason and act on the assumption, that, what the writers and talkers say, everybody thinks. Nay, a very few writers if they write a great deal, and a very few talkers if they talk a great deal, and talk loudly and confidently and repeat themselves and quote one another, can easily create an impression, in regard to some subjects, that the world is on their side when it is not. And when to this is added the whole machinery of party and popular agitation, — pamphlets, periodical publications, newspapers, meetings, speeches, agencies, — it is astonishing how small a number of leading and active spirits can make their earnest cry, either for or against the project in hand, sound like the public voice. So it was with a knot of philosophers in the opening scenes of the first French Revolution. Even in our own days, a single newspaper in London aspires, we are told, to manufacture public opinion for the whole kingdom. So profound is my reverence for the will of the people, or of even a majority of the people, that, could I be sure it has been expressed freely and understandingly, I should hardly hesitate, in any case, to obey. But I must have better evidence that the people will it, than the reiterated and passionate asseverations of zealots or demagogues assuming to speak in their name. I remember that among the people are vast numbers who cannot be said to have made up any mind on the subject, and also that many among those who have made up their minds are kept back from expressing them by constitutional reserve, or by inability or distaste for controversy. I remember, too, Burke's often-quoted illustration: "Because half-a-dozen grasshoppers under a fern make the field ring with their importunate chink, whilst thousands of great cattle, reposed beneath the shadow of the British oak, chew the cud and are silent, pray do not imagine that those who make the noise are the only inhabitants of the field; that of course they are many in number; or that, after all, they are other than the little, shrivelled, meagre, hopping, though loud and troublesome insects of the hour."

There is nothing of which I feel more confident than I do of this: that what often passes for public opinion is not public opinion, but the passions and prejudices of a few heated, and it may be interested, writers and talkers. Happily, in almost every community making the smallest pretensions to intelligence and freedom, there is a powerful reserve of moderate and silent men, who seldom cause themselves to be heard or felt in public matters, but yet are known to exist, and, by creating a fear of reactions, operate as a check on violent and headlong counsels. I say, "by creating a fear of reactions;" for the liability to reactions, about which so much is said, would seem to resolve itself into the fact, that ordinarily a considerable portion of society take but little part in the great movements going on around them, until alarm at the waywardness or extravagance of these movements constrains them, contrary to all their natural tastes and inclinations, to speak out. When they do speak out, and not until they do, we are in a condition to know what the public opinion really is,—that which previously passed for it being but a counterfeit and a pretence. I hold therefore, that, in making up our minds as to what public opinion enjoins or forbids, we are not to look to the writers and talkers alone ; but are to take into the account that powerful reserve of moderate and for the most part silent men, on whom, as I believe, in all great and trying emergencies God has made the order and stability of society in no small measure to depend. Truth and justice, as it seems to me, demand this at our hand. Besides, were we always disposed to take this course. I need not say how much it would do to save both Church and State from those panics and violent and disastrous convulsions, which have done so much, and are likely to do so much more, to trouble and retard the progress of humanity and civilization.

But supposing it to be conceded whither public opinion points, another question arises :—Is it an enlightened public opinion ; that is, one formed on a proper understanding of the subject, and freely expressed ? Who would, for example, give much weight to the public voice in despotic countries, where not a word is printed which has not passed under a rigid censorship of the press, nor a word uttered in favor of liberty or against the powers that be, even in familiar intercourse, but at the hazard of men's lives? Who, again, would attach much importance to universal consent in matters of faith among the Roman Catholics, where the principle is avowedly acted on of submitting all individual differences to the unity of the Church? In all such cases there is no proper public opinion; there can be none: the voice is the voice of many, but the opinion is the opinion of one or a few of a past age. In all such cases the consent of the multitude is not the result of opinion, but of arrangement and influence; men giving their suffrages as mechanically as if you heard the clatter of the machinery by which their hands are lifted up.

Then, too, there are mysterious states of mind as well as body, brought about we cannot always tell how, in consequence of which, as in the witchcraft times, whole communities, though comparatively enlightened and free, become liable to strange delusions. The delusion arises and spreads, and takes on the laws of an epidemic, and the people are mad, and not the less so because all are mad together. But what regard is due to public opinion when, as in such cases, it appears under the form of public frenzy?

Add to this that local or sectional interests or prejudices often have the effect to blind and pervert the judgment, so as to make it of little or no value as evidence of truth and right, though the almost unanimous judgment of a whole community. Have you never known a difficult financial, political, or moral question, respecting which those for whose supposed interest, convenience, or safety it is that it should be decided in one way, maintain almost to a man that it ought to be so decided, while those for whose supposed interest, convenience, or safety it is that it should be decided in the opposite way, are just as confident and unanimous that it ought to be so decided? Narrow-minded men may suspect and charge one at least of the parties to such a contest with acting against what they see to be right; but it is much more reasonable, as well as much more fair and magnanimous, to suppose that neither party is in a condition to see what is right in the particular question. If so, however, their united opinion on the subject, though honestly entertained and freely expressed, is not worth a straw. We can see this in our neighbors, and especially in our opponents; but, unhappily, we cannot see it in ourselves. The very idea that a man's judgment is blinded or perverted, by prejudice or passion, implies that he himself is insensible to the delusion; otherwise, I hardly need say, the delusion would not be.

sent in opinion and concert in action are often brought about, especially in politics and religion, and then tell me candidly how much such consent and concert are worth. If, indeed, the uniformity insisted on resulted from the free, independent, and unbiassed action of individual minds calmly deciding the question on its merits, and in view of all the evidence on both sides, and with a single eye to the truth, it would be a moral miracle if it varied much from the reality. But no such thing. Take away what early education has done, and what mere authority has done, and what sympathy and imitation have done, and what party spirit and party drill have done, and what addresses to the feelings, and especially to men's fears and jealousies, have done,—and what is there left? Public opinion, do you say? Ought it not rather to be accounted an illustration of the practicability of casting a multitude of minds in one and the same mould, wherever the proper apparatus for doing it exists, and the right sort of men can be found to work it? I do not mean that a wise man will slight or contemn, or needlessly defy even, such a public opinion; but he will hardly regard it as the fruit of profound research and free discussion, or as being in any way the effect of evidence, or as being itself of the nature of evidence that should weigh with the weight of a feather in making up his own conclusions. He knows that whoever supposes a multitude of persons can really think, and yet think exactly alike, has yet to learn what thinking means. Accordingly, so far as authority or argument is concerned, he will be more influenced by conclusions deliberately arrived at by a single individual of an honest and gifted mind, who has really examined the subject for himself under the best lights of an advancing science and civilization, than by the consent of many thousands, where this consent is obviously a matter of tradition, or policy, or sympathy, or drill, or a mere echo. What a noted writer has said is strictly true: "One man, who has in him a higher wisdom, or a hitherto unknown spiritual truth, is stronger, — not than ten men who have it not, nor than ten thousand, — but stronger than all men who have it not, and stands out among them with quite an ethereal, angelic power."

Let me call your attention to another circumstance. What gives to public opinion its chief and characteristic value consists in this: that it is understood to result from a great variety of minds, acting under a great variety of influences and prepossessions, and so tending to balance, qualify, and correct one another. It is understood to be an opinion in which the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the learned and the unlearned concur. Hence it follows, that the public opinion of a party as to the measures of the party, or of employers on one side, or of workmen on the other, as to their respective rights and duties, is not public opinion, properly so called. The same is also true of collections of persons living together in temporary or partial separation from the rest of the world, so as to have what is called a public opinion of their own, especially where community of age, or of prejudice, or of taste and pursuits inclines them all to look on subjects under one and the same point of view. Under such circumstances, what is sometimes appealed to as public opinion is not public opinion. It is not the opinion of the public, but of a minute and isolated portion of the public,—an opinion also generated and pronounced under special biasses of judgment, with nothing to balance, modify, or correct these biasses. So far from being the opinion of the public, it is the opinion of a class or clique. This, I know, may be right; let us hope that it generally is so: what I insist upon is, that it is just as liable to be misled by one-sided views of subjects as the opinion of an individual; and when it is thus misled, a sense of numbers will only have the effect to exaggerate and intensify the one-sidedness and the mischiefs growing out of it. For this reason, if a man expects aid to his conscience from public opinion, it must be from a large and comprehensive public opinion. It must not be the public opinion of his clique or party; and therefore it is well if what he sometimes calls public opinion, that is, the prevalent opinion among those immediately about him, is not continually tempting him to do what his own conscience, and the public conscience rightly understood, alike condemn.

One caution more. We are never to give way to public opinion, however formed and however well ascertained, in such a manner, or in such a spirit, as to be "like children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the slight of men and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive."

On a multitude of questions respecting the mere externals of life a wise man will do as others do; not because he has no opinion of his own, but because it is reason enough, in such cases, to take one course rather than another, if such is the common practice. Moreover, it is a great mistake to suppose that deference to public opinion is, in general, a temptation to inconstancy and fickleness, to innovation and change: on the contrary, it is the sheet-anchor of conservatism. Read the lives of such men as Chillingworth and Blanco White.

All admit their ability and general excellence of character; but all lament, at the same time, their melancholy instability of faith, which arose not from too much but from too little sympathy with the common mind. What was said of one of them applies to the whole class: "His frequent changes proceeded from too nice an inquisition into truth: his doubts grew out of himself: he assisted them with all the strength of his reason: he was then too hard for himself; but finding as little quiet and repose in those victories, he quickly recovered by a new appeal to his own judgment; so that, in all his sallies and retreats, he was in fact his own convert."

Sometimes, however, the vertigo seizes the public, a whole community, a whole sect or party, only here and there an individual being spared. What shall these individuals do? Then, too, there are great interests and questions, in respect to which the legitimate condition of the human mind is one of progress, and the natural order of this progress is that the few should be in advance of the many. Shall the few, from fear of the many, or from a slavish regard to public opinion, be unfaithful to this trust? Foreigners contend, and I am afraid not entirely without reason, that, owing to political and social peculiarities, there is no country on the face of the earth where a selfish or timid subserviency to public opinion is carried so far as it is here ; in short, that, with all our boast of independence, there is no people among whom so little real independence is to be found, especially among those who ought to lead and not merely to follow public sentiment. “Ye have not so learned Christ ; if so be that ye have heard him, and have been taught by him, as the truth is in Jesus.” To allow the individual to be merged and lost in the mass, to be turned into a mere tool, copy, echo of the public will and the public voice, would be to forget and frustrate the essential purpose, the very genius, the distinctive peculiarity of Christianity. Every man, we are told, is to bear his own burden ; every man is to have his rejoicing in himself, and not in another : to his own Master he is to stand or fall. Moreover, the whole doctrine of Divine influences supposes a man to act from his own spirit, as the same has been touched and regenerated by the Spirit of God. We may still think with others ; on most subjects we probably shall, and it is natural and right that we should ; but it must be because we really think with them, and not because we allow them to think for us, turning us this way or that as they will. Under all circumstances, at any risk, we must have a mind of our own, as the condition of having a soul of our own ; “ that we henceforth be no more children, tossed to and fro and carried about with every wind of doctrine, by the slight of men and cunning craftiness whereby they lie in wait to deceive; but speaking the truth in love, may grow up into him in all things which is the head, even Christ.'

AM I NOT IN SPORT?

“As a madman who casteth firebrands, arrows, and death, so is the man who deceiveth his neighbor, and saith, Am not I in sport?”—
PROVERBS XXVI. 18, 19.

IT is incalculable how much pain is inflicted, and how much injury is done, without any thing which can properly be called malicious intent, or deliberate wrong. Thus there are those who, like the madman mentioned in Scripture, will cast firebrands, arrows, and death, and then think it a sufficient excuse to say, “Are we not in sport?” Let it be that they are, I think it will not be difficult to show that this will not excuse, or do much to palliate, the conduct in question. I think it will not be difficult to show that men are answerable for the mischiefs they do from mere wantonness or in sport, and that it is wrong-doing of this description which makes up no inconsiderable part of every one’s guilt.

It is to little or no purpose to be able to say that such offences do not originate in conscious malice, for, as has just been intimated, the same is true of a large proportion of acknowledged crimes. It is seldom, very seldom, that men injure one another from hatred, or for the sake of revenge,—because they find, or expect to find, any pleasure in the mere consciousness of inflicting pain. Men injure one another from wantonness, or want of consideration; or, more commonly still, because the carrying out of their policy, or their prejudices, or their sport happens to interfere with the interests and comfort of others, and, though really sorry for this, they are not prepared to give up either their policy, or their prejudices, or their sport to spare another's feelings. Wars are waged and conquests made, and mourning and desolation spread through a whole country, in the wantonness of honor, or to gratify an insatiable ambition; but without any thing which can properly be called malice, either in the first movers or immediate agents. Men opposed to each other in politics or religion will allow this opposition to go to very unjustifiable lengths, even to the disturbing of the peace of neighborhoods, and the breaking of friendships and family connections; and all this, to be sure, must give rise to a great deal of ill-will and hot blood; but it does not originate in malice, properly so called,—in positive malice towards any body. So likewise a rash and improvident man may bring incalculable mischiefs on all connected with him, involving them in pecuniary difficulties, or committing and paining them in other ways, and yet be able to allege with perfect truth that he did not mean to do them any harm; that, so far from being actuated by malice, he feels nothing and has felt nothing but the sincerest affection for the very persons whom he has injured, and most affection, perhaps, for those whom he has most injured. But why multiply illustrations? The whole catalogue of the vices of self-indulgence and excess, — black and comprehensive as it is, — has nothing to do with malicious intent; that is to say, these vices do not find any part of their temptation or gratification in ill-will to others, or in the consciousness of causing misery to others. And yet who, on this account, denies that they are vices, or that they are among the worst of vices?

Hence, the moral perplexity existing in some minds on this subject may be traced to two errors: making malice to be the only bad motive by which we can be actuated; and confounding the mere absence of malice with that active principle of benevolence, or love of our neighbor, which Christianity makes to be the foundation and substance of all true social virtue.

How unfounded the first of these assumptions

is, appears generally from what has been said; but the same may also be shown on strictly ethical grounds. We must distinguish between what is simply odious, and what is immoral: the malignant passions when acted out by animals are odious, but they are not immoral, because they are not comprehended in that light by the agent. The reason why the malignant passions are immoral in man is that he knows them to be immoral; and accordingly any other passion, which he knows to be immoral, becomes for the same reason alike immoral to him as a principle of conduct. Hence it follows that, though not actuated by malice, we may be by some other motive equally reprehensible in a moral point of view, though not perhaps as odious, — by the love of ease, by vanity or pride, by unjust partialities, by inordinate ambition, by avarice or lust, — dispositions which have nothing to do with malice, but yet are felt and acknowledged by all to be bad and immoral. Moreover, the tendencies of modern civilization are to be considered in this connection. Times of violence are gradually giving place to times of self-indulgence and fraud; and the consequence is that now, where one man is betrayed into vices of malevolence and outrage, twenty are betrayed into those of frivolity, licentiousness, or overreaching. I go further still

Suppose a man actuated by none of these positively bad motives; nay, suppose the injury done to be accidental and wholly unintentional, this will not in all cases justify the deed. The question still arises whether the injury done, supposing it to be wholly unintentional, might not have been foreseen and ought not to have been foreseen; for, where the well-being of others is concerned, we are bound not only to mean no harm, but to take care to avoid every thing which is likely to do harm: and negligence in this respect is itself a crime. So obviously just is this principle, so entirely does it approve itself to the reason and common sense of mankind, that we find it everywhere recognized, in some form or other, in the jurisprudence of civilized countries. "When a workman flings down a stone or piece of timber into the street, and kills a man, this may be either misadventure, manslaughter, or murder, according to the circumstances under which the original act is done. If it were in a country village, where a few passengers are, and he calls out to all people to have a care, it is misadventure only; but if it were in London, or other populous town, where people are continually passing, it is manslaughter, though he gives loud warning; and murder, if he knows of their passing and gives no warning at all, for then it is malice against all mankind." <sup>1</sup>

Equally groundless is the second of the above-mentioned assumptions, — to wit, that of confounding the mere absence of malice with the active principle of benevolence itself, or that love of our neighbor which Christianity makes to be the foundation and substance of all true social virtue. There is nothing, perhaps, which more essentially distinguishes worldly propriety and legal honesty from Christian virtue than this, that they stop with negatives. They are content with avoiding what is expressly forbidden, not reflecting that this, at the best, only makes men to be not bad; it does not make them to be good. Besides, if we take this ground, if we allege the absence of all anger and resentment, we bar the plea that we were hurried into the act by the impetuosity of our passions, — a plea which the experience of a common infirmity has always led men to regard as the strongest extenuating circumstance of wrong-doing. If we have given pain to a fellow-creature, it is stating an aggravation of the fault and not an excuse, to say that we did not do it in passion but in cold blood; and worse still, if we say that we did it in sport. What! find sport in giving pain to others? This may consist, I suppose, with the absence of what is commonly understood by malice; but I utterly deny its compatibility with active Christian benevolence, or with what indeed amounts to the same thing, a kind, generous, and magnanimous nature. Were I in quest of facts to prove the total depravity of man, I should eagerly seize on such as the following:— the shouts of heartless merriment sometimes heard to arise from a crowd of idlers collected round a miserable object in the streets; a propensity to turn into ridicule, not merely the faults and affectations of others, but their natural deformities or defects; jesting with sacred things, or practical jests, the consequences of which to one of the parties are of the most serious and painful character; and the pleasure with which men listen to sarcastic remarks though causeless and unprovoked, or to wit the whole point of which consists in its sting. Not that the doctrine of universal and total depravity is actually proved even by such conduct, for happily the conduct itself is not universal; to some it is repugnant from the beginning; and besides, even where it is fallen into, I suppose it is to be referred in a majority of cases to a love of excitement, rather than to a love of evil for its own sake. Still I maintain that the conduct in question, however explained, is incompatible, or at any rate utterly inconsistent, with thoughtful and generous natures.

Still, many who would not think entirely to excuse the conduct in question can find pallia-tions for it and extenuating circumstances, some of which it will be well to examine.

In the first place it is said that the sport is not found in the sufferings of the victim, but in the awkward and ludicrous situations and embarrassments into which he is thrown. Now I admit, that, if these awkwardnesses and absurdities could be entirely disconnected with the idea of pain, they might amuse even a good mind: but as they cannot be thus disconnected,—as all this is known and seen to be the expression of anguish either of body or mind, or to be the consequence of some natural defect or misfortune, or some cruel imposition on weakness or good nature,—I affirm as before, that he whose mirth is not checked by this single consideration betrays a want of true benevolence, and even of common humanity. Neither will it help the matter much to say that the pain and mortification are not known, are not seen, or at least are not attended to; that this view of the subject is entirely overlooked, the mind being wholly taken up with its ludicrous aspects. For how comes it that we have so quick a sense to every thing ludicrous in the situation and conduct of others, but no sense at all to their sufferings? Our hearts, it would seem, are not as yet steeled against all sympathy in the sufferings and misfortunes of our neighbors, provided we can be made to apprehend and realize them; and this is well: but why so slow to apprehend and realize them? If, though directly before our eyes, the thought of them never occurs to our minds; if we can say, and say with truth, that while we enjoyed the sport it never once occurred to us that it was at the expense of another's feelings, though this fact was all the time staring us in the face, — does it not at least betray a degree of indifference or carelessness about the feelings of others, which is only compatible with a cold and selfish temper? Put whatever construction you will, therefore, on this kind of sport, it argues a bad state of the affections: for either its connection with the pain and mortification of others is perceived, and then it is downright cruelty; or it is not perceived, and then it is downright insensibility.

Another ground is sometimes taken. There are those who will say, “We cannot help it. Persons of a constitution less susceptible to the ludicrous, or less quick to observe it, may do differently, but we cannot.” Obviously, however, reasonings of this sort, if intended as a valid excuse, betray a singular and almost hopeless confusion of moral ideas. They cannot help it? Of course they do not mean that they would be affected in the same way by the same thing, under all circumstances and in all states of feeling. Let the coarse jest be at the expense of a parent, or of a sister; or let its tendency be to bring derision on an office, a cause, or a doctrine which we have much at heart; or let it offend beyond a certain point against the conventional usages of what is called good society,—and, instead of provoking mirth, it provokes indignation or contempt. All they can mean, therefore, is simply this: their sense of the ludicrous is so keen, that, when not restrained by some present feeling of justice, humanity, or decorum, it becomes irrepressible. Undoubtedly it does; but this is no more than what might be said of the worst crimes of sensuality and excess. What would you think if a sordid man should plead, that being sordid by nature, and not having any high principle or feeling to restrain him, he cannot help acting sordidly? Does he not know that it is this want of high principle and feeling which constitutes the very essence of his sin? We have shown that to find sport in what gives pain, argues a bad state of the principles and affections. Manifestly, therefore, it is to no purpose to urge as an excuse, that in the existing state of our principles and affections we cannot help it; for the existing state of our principles and affections is the very thing which is complained of and condemned.

It may be contended, as a last resort, that this state of mind is consistent, to say the least, with amiable manners, companionable qualities, and good nature. But if herein is meant to be included real kindness of heart, or the highest forms of generosity and nobleness of soul, I deny that it can be. There is no necessity of trying to make it out that men of this stamp are worse than they really are. Unquestionably they can and often do make themselves agreeable and entertaining, especially to those who are not very scrupulous about the occasions of their mirth, and feel no repugnance to join in a laugh which perhaps they would hesitate to raise. Good-natured also they may be, if nothing more is meant by this than the absence of an unaccommodating, morose, and churlish disposition: for there are two sorts of good nature; the good nature of benevolence, and the good nature of ease and indifference. The first will not consist, as we have seen, with wrong-doing from wantonness or in sport; but the last may; yet even when it does, not much credit can accrue from this circumstance. Worthy of all honor is that good nature which springs from genuine kindness and sympathy, or a desire to make and to see everybody happy; but the same can hardly be said of what often passes for good nature in the world, though it is nothing but the result of an easy temper and loose principles.

Still, I cannot but think that a large majority of those who sometimes look for sport in wrongdoing have enough of humanity and of justice to restrain them, if they could only be made to understand and feel the extent of the injury thus occasioned. Take, for example, jesting with sacred things. Its influence on those who indulge in it is worse than that of infidelity; for it destroys our reverence, and it is harder to recover our reverence, after it has been lost, than our convictions. Nay, it is often worse than that of daring crime: the latter puts us in opposition to religion; but it does not necessarily undermine our respect for it, or the sentiment on which the whole rests. Consider, too, its effects on others. The multitude are apt to mistake what is laughed at by their superiors for what is ridiculous in itself. In France it was not the sober arguments of a knot of misguided atheists, but the scoffs and mockeries and ill-timed pleasantries in which the higher classes generally shared, which destroyed the popular sense of the sanctity of religion; and when this great regulative principle of society was gone, it was not long before the mischief came back, amidst scenes of popular license and desperation, "to plague the inventors." And so of cruel sports. In reading the Sermon on the Mount, you must have been struck with the fact, that, while he who is angry with his brother is only said to be in danger of the judgment, "whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire." But, on second thoughts, is this any thing more than a simple recognition of what we all know to be true; that hatred does not inflict half so deep or bitter a feeling of wrong as scorn? Much is said about the disorganizing doctrines and theories of the day; but, bad as these are, they are not likely to do so much to exasperate the poor against the rich, and break down the bulwarks of order and law, as the conduct of some among the rich themselves. The time was when the few could trample with indifference on the interests and feelings of the many, and make sport of their complaints with impunity; but that time has passed away.

One word also on those cruel sports where animals, and not men, are the sufferers. Cruelty to animals is essentially the same feeling with cruelty to a fellow-creature, and in some respects it is even more unbecoming. Man is as a god to the inferior races. To abuse the power which this gives us over the helpless beings that Providence has placed at our mercy, is as mean as it is inhuman. If we would listen to the pleadings of what is noble and generous in our natures, it would be as impossible for us needlessly to harm an unof-fending animal, as it would be to strike an infant or an idiot. Shame on the craven who quails before his equals, and then goes away and wreaks his unmanly resentments on a creature which he knows can neither retaliate nor speak! Besides, we may suppose that there are orders of beings above us, as well as below us. Look then at our treatment of the lower animals, and then ask yourselves what we should think, if a superior order of beings should mete out to us the same measure. What if in mere wantonness, or to pamper unnatural tastes, they should subject us to every imaginable hardship and wrong? What if they should make a show, a public recreation, of our foolish contests and dying agonies? Nay, more; what if it should come to this, that in their language a man-killer should be called a sportsman by way of distinction?

But I must close. I wage no idle and bootless war against innocent mirth. We have it on the authority of the Bible, and we read it in the constitution of man, that there is "a time to weep and a time to laugh." There will also be ample scope for the legitimate action of caustic wit, so long as there are follies to be shown up, pretenders to be unmasked, and conceit and affectation to be taught to know themselves. But, in the serious strifes of the world, the ultimate advantages of this weapon, though wielded on the right side, are more than dubious. "The Spaniards have lamented," it has been said, "and I believe truly, that Cervantes' just and inimitable ridicule of knight-errantry rooted up, with that folly, a great deal of their real honor. And it was apparent that Butler's fine satire on fanaticism contributed not a little, during the licentious times of Charles II., to bring sober piety into disrepute. The reason is evident: there are many lines of resemblance between truth and its counterfeits; and it is the province of wit only to find out the likenesses in things, and not the talent of the common admirers of it to discover the differences." At any rate we can shun the rock of small wits, who think to make up for poverty of invention by scurrility and grimace, who think to gain from the venom of the shaft what is wanting in the vigor of the bow. We can imitate the example of those among the great masters of wit in all ages, who have ennobled it by purity of expression and a moral aim; so that, in the end, virtue may not have occasion to blush, or humanity to mourn, for any thing we have said or done. Take any other course, and we are reminded of the confession which experience wrung from the lips of the Wise Man: "I said in my heart, Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth ; therefore enjoy pleasure : and behold this also is vanity. I said of laughter, It is mad ; and of mirth, What doeth it ? ” “ Even in laughter the heart is sorrowful, and the end of that mirth is heaviness. ”

HONESTY.

"In all things willing to live honestly" — HEBREWS xiii. 18.

WHEN a man's honesty is questioned, it is common to refer the charge to some business transaction. But this is taking a narrow and false view of the subject. A partisan who knowingly avails himself of sophistical arguments in recommending a cause however sacred, is a dishonest man. A demagogue who makes use of popular prejudices which he secretly despises, in order to compass ambitious schemes, is a dishonest man. The hypocrite, the sycophant, the charlatan, — these are all dishonest men. Thus there are a multitude of ways in which a man can show himself honest or dishonest, — ways which have nothing to do with buying or selling.

Honesty includes all those qualities which go to make up that sort of character which inspires confidence. By an honest man we mean a true man, — a man who can be depended on in all changes of circumstances, in all vicissitudes of fortune. He is one who feels what he professes, thinks and means what he says, is what he seems. He is not one man to-day, and another man to-morrow; one man in one company, and another man in another company; one man to me and another man to you. You always know where to find him. An honest man may have his failings; nay, more, he may have great faults, — faults of manner and faults of temper. Honest men are not necessarily perfect men. They may be wrong-headed to almost any extent, — ignorant, prejudiced, overbearing, irritable, malicious even; but it is contrary to their nature to be false. Honesty of character is another name for directness and transparency of character; what is without corresponds to and indicates what is within; in one word, the life is an acted truth, and not an acted lie.

But who is likely to listen to a sermon on honesty, as being personally interested in the appeal? Men are not slow to acknowledge themselves guilty of other sins, or at least extremely liable to them, — the sins of ignorance or weakness, of passion or inconsideration; but who will confess that he is dishonest? Who feels that he is in much danger of becoming so?

What does more perhaps than any thing else to create and foster this delusion is the verbal paradox, that a man may be honest and yet not be honest at the same time. That is to say, he may be honest in one sense of the word and not honest in another; for honesty is a word which is used in different senses. Sometimes it stands for what is called legal honesty, meaning thereby that sort of honesty which is determined and enforced by human laws. Sometimes it stands for what is called worldly honesty, meaning thereby that sort of honesty which recognizes nothing higher than public opinion as its motive, measure, and end. And sometimes it stands for what alone should be called Christian honesty, meaning thereby that sort of honesty which consists in being honest according to the gospel standard of honesty, for its own sake, and in the fear of God.

Now I am willing to admit that most persons moving about in respectable society are honest in one or another of these ways. We hear a great deal about "common honesty," and doubtless there is a kind or degree of honesty which is common enough. But who will say that this is true of Christian honesty? And here it becomes us to consider whether any of the other forms of honesty are not essentially defective even as honesty. In other words, must we not make a distinction between real and nominal honesty, just as we make a distinction between real and nominal Christianity?

Consider, in the first place, how little claim a man has to be regarded as really honest, who can pretend to nothing better than legal honesty, the honesty that never looks beyond or above human laws for its rule or its sanction. Human laws, as everybody knows, do not even so much as aim or profess to determine and enforce all right as such, but only so much of right as is necessary to the order and well-being of society. Beyond this, they very properly leave men to the restraints of conscience, and public opinion, and the fear of a future retribution. Even, therefore, if human laws were perfect as far as they go, it would by no means follow that it is enough to be honest according to law. There are a multitude of questions of right and wrong daily arising in the intercourse of society, which the laws do not touch; and if in respect to these a man shows himself regardless of moral principle, he shows himself to be at bottom a dishonest man. I say this advisedly. If when the laws, for good reasons, refuse to interfere, and devolve the whole matter on conscience alone, a man's conscience also fails to act, it shows that he has no conscience. It is an abuse of language to say of such a man that he is honest according to law, inasmuch as his obedience to law does not spring from a sense of right. Unless a man acts from a principle of honesty, he is not, properly speaking, honest at all. A man does not show himself to be really honest, in any form or degree, by being honest as long as the laws compel him to be so, but by being honest when he is free to be so, or not, as he pleases.

Besides, it is conceding too much in favor of what is called legal honesty, to allow it to be assumed that the laws themselves are always what they should be. There are such things as bad laws; and, though these can legalize wrong, they can hardly make wrong to be right. Indeed, now that laws are made and unmade with so much facility, and often under the disturbing influences of popular or party excitement, have we not almost as much to apprehend from wrong-doing under color and sanction of law, as from wrong-doing in open violation of law? Yet I suppose all will agree, that wrong-doing in either case is wrong-doing. If there is such a thing as being honest according to law, there is also such a thing as being dishonest according to law. Certainly I cannot be mistaken here. If I do what I know and feel to be unfair or overreaching, an iniquitous law may be found to screen me; but what of that? It may keep me from being actually treated as a dishonest man; but will it keep me from de- *servi*ng to be so treated? I do not say but that, under a free government like ours, a bad law is to be submitted to, until it is repealed by the proper authorities, merely because it is the law. It is one thing, however, to submit to a bad law, — that is, to suffer under it, — and quite another to take advantage of it; the latter being in all cases, as it seems to me, neither more nor less than making use of one wrong to justify or excuse another.

Thus does it appear that legal honesty, meaning thereby that sort of honesty that can be, and is, enforced by human laws, is radically and essentially defective, even as honesty. It is so, in the first place, because human laws are sometimes bad and iniquitous in themselves; in the second place, because these laws however good in themselves are sometimes made, through the imperfection of human foresight and human language, to cover cases of substantial injustice; and in the third and last place, because human laws even when right in themselves, and rightly executed and applied as far as they go, do not even so much as aim or profess to determine and enforce all right as such, but only so much of right as is necessary to the public welfare. I do not mean that there is no honesty in obedience to the laws, or that any man can be honest, in a community like ours, without such obedience ; but this I say: the proof of his honesty, instead of beginning where this obedience begins, begins rather where this obedience ends. To prove that we are honest, we must persist in doing what is right, not only as long as the laws stand ready to coerce it, but also when, from any cause, they leave us free to do otherwise.

Let us next inquire how it is with worldly honesty,—the honesty, I mean, which has no better foundation than a regard for public opinion and worldly success. This, I hardly need say, is sometimes better, and sometimes worse, than a strictly legal honesty. It is sometimes better, because public opinion for the time being may be in advance of the laws, and require more ; on the other hand, it is sometimes worse, because public opinion, for the time being, may fall behind the laws, and require less. In the latter case, the best of laws, though unrepealed, are apt to become either wholly or in part a dead letter. Making the most of worldly honesty, it is but another name for what may be called the average virtue in the community, for the time being, with this distinction, that it supposes some degree of reflection and forethought. It is the virtue of men who are wise in their generation, and think to find in worldly wisdom alone a sufficient foundation and guarantee of upright conduct. It is the virtue of men who are for ever recurring to the maxim that "honesty is the best policy;" who think it is only necessary for men to know what their interest is, and they will do what is right; who would fain resolve all crime into ignorance or mistake, and cannot find it in their hearts to say any thing worse of sin, than that it is a great blunder.

Now unquestionably there is much truth in these assumptions; it is not however the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. A Christian should be the last person in the world to deny that "honesty is the best policy." God has made it to be so in all cases. It is not only the greatest rule, but there are no real or imaginable exceptions to the rule, so long as all a man's interests are taken into the account. In no case whatsoever is it consistent with a man's interests to deviate, though but for a hair's breadth, from strict right, if by "a man's interests" are meant all his interests. But if we are going to restrict our view to a part of his interests, and to the lowest and most inconsiderable part, that alters the case. It is by no means so clear but that some deviations from strict right may be consistent with a part of a man's interests, — with those, for example, which pertain to this world. It may still be true, as doubtless it is, even if we look not beyond this life, that honesty is the best policy as a general rule ; but who will say that it is a rule which admits absolutely of no exceptions ? And the mischief of these exceptions does not end with leaving virtue unsupported, when they actually occur. The idea that there are exceptions will tempt every person, who is sorely tried, to believe or to assume that the case in hand is one of them ; and he will act accordingly.

I come, therefore, to this conclusion : even if policy of any kind were sufficient of itself to make a man honest, it would not be worldly policy. It must be a policy which comprehends all a man's interests, — the interests of his soul as well as those of his body, the interests of eternity as well as those of time ; in short, it must be Christian policy : otherwise it would be essentially defective even as policy.

But I am far from believing that policy, of any name or nature, is to be regarded as the legitimate ground, or as a sufficient safeguard of strict honesty. Those who think it enough to demonstrate that "honesty is the best policy" would seem to proceed on the assumption, that every man takes that course which he is convinced will be for his interest in the long run. But is it so ? Dismiss, for a moment, all theories on the subject, and look at facts. Take that vast catalogue of vices and crimes which originate in disordered appetite or unbridled passion. Do you suppose that the men who give way to these temptations really think they are consulting their interests here or hereafter; that they are doing what it is good policy to do? No! a thousand times, no! If you still entertain any doubts on the subject, go and ask them in moments when thought returns, and they will answer you just as I have done, mingling the confession with bitter imprecations on their own weakness and folly.

On this point we must guard against a mistaken inference from men's acknowledged selfishness. Men are selfish; but it is a selfishness which, when left to itself, looks not to self-advantage but to self-indulgence, and to self-indulgence at any cost. You may think to find an exception to this remark in the griping and pinching habits of the miser; but it is an exception in appearance only. Even he is not counting on any real and substantial benefits as the reward of his labors and sacrifices; he does but yield to the blind impulse of a present passion, the greed of gain.

No; what we chiefly need is not more selfishness, Heaven knows; but more principle, — a reverence for what is right, fidelity and devotion to duty. And this is precisely that state of mind which Christianity aims to induce. It is taking a most unworthy view of the gospel, to suppose it contents itself with setting before us life and death, heaven and hell, and leaving them to act as they may on the selfishness of our nature. The aim of our Saviour's teachings, I might almost say their whole purport and end, is to excite, develop, and enlighten our moral and spiritual faculties; to create within us a spontaneous aversion and disgust for what is mean and base; to awaken and call out disinterested and inextinguishable aspirations for what is pure and noble, and a living and all-sustaining sense of the Divine presence and agency. When this change is wrought upon us, and not before, we may hope to comprehend the full import of that dark Scripture, "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God."

Taking this view of honesty, who will say that the subject is not a proper one for the Christian pulpit at all times? If I went no further than to recommend legal honesty, or worldly honesty, or even a pagan or deistic honesty, it might be otherwise. The old cry might be raised, "You are preaching no more than what Socrates and Seneca preached." But certainly neither Socrates nor Seneca ever preached Christian honesty; the honesty that finds its law, its spirit, and its tests in the New Testament. The indiscriminate offence taken by some, at what they call "moral preaching," grows out of confounding together two propositions which are very far from being identical. They say that religion is one thing, and morality another; and this is true. They go on to say, as if it were to repeat the same doctrine in other words, that Christianity is one thing, and morality another; but this is not true. The reason is that the gospel everywhere inculcates a peculiar morality as well as a peculiar religion; so that the former is just as much Christianity as the latter. Do not understand me to say one word against evangelical faith, or evangelical piety: all I ask for is that to these may be added more and more of evangelical honesty.

There is call for this exhortation in all sects, and especially in those which make the greatest pretensions to sanctity and zeal. Whose fault is it, that men of business are put on their guard when they find themselves dealing with one who assumes to be more than usually religious? Is it not because long experience has taught them that the honesty of professed Christians is often a very different thing from Christian honesty? Is this scandal to last for ever? Christianity will never stand before the world on the vantage-ground it ought to hold, until those who claim to represent it are known, not by the badges of this or that sect, but by the singular purity and rectitude of their conduct. And this suggests the best criterion by which to determine the comparative merits of rival creeds. One is best for one thing, and another for another. One induces reverence for authority; another stirs the religious emotions; a third makes missionaries and martyrs. All this is well as far as it goes; but the result is not a complete and well-balanced Christian character. The best form of religion is that which assigns a proper place to reverence, to the emotions, and to zeal, but lays its principal stress on the doctrine that, to be accepted of God, a man must be good,—thoroughly good, honest, trustworthy, in all the relations of life. The best form of religion is that which leads men to respect one another, and deal fairly with one another; the worst form of religion is that which leads men to hate or despise one another.

Let me add that the inculcation of strict probity and incorruptibleness is doubly necessary in seasons of great social and political disturbance. It is sometimes said that war, even a civil war, is favorable to the higher virtues; and so in a certain sense it is. It offers frequent occasions for heroic deeds; it calls for self-denial and self-sacrifice in tones of unwonted power; it is also a school for the manly qualities of courage and endurance, of a generous patriotism and a lofty ambition. All this I freely admit; but I must qualify it by observing, that opportunities are afforded, at the same time, for giant frauds; that the restraining power of public opinion is disordered, and on some subjects wholly perverted; in fine, that minds, and good minds too, become so intent on success as to be more or less unscrupulous about the means. In this state of things, why wonder that measures should be sometimes advocated, and men upheld, on principles to which nothing but the blinding and corrupting influences of the terrible struggle could reconcile a people of any pretensions to justice and honor.

To counteract such tendencies let the pulpit be faithful to its high function, and amidst the din of conflicting interests and passions hold up the Christian standard of a perfect righteousness. Woe to those who traffic in the public distresses and perplexities with a view to dishonest gains! Woe to those who palter with the public conscience, even though it is with a mistaken view to the public good! Our country, in this hour of her extreme peril, expects great sacrifices from us, but not the sacrifice of integrity and honor. We believe that the right is on our side: let us stand on that right, and glorify it by a conduct worthy of the great and solemn issue! Not only the future of our own country. but that of freedom and human rights everywhere, is at stake : the battle is fought in the face of a world from which we look for little sympathy ; still the danger is not that we shall be slain by the sword, but that we shall fail to exhibit a degree of private and public virtue equal to the exigency, — that we shall not have union enough, or magnanimity enough, or Christian principle enough to save us from a general demoralization, in which our own honor and the best hopes of mankind will go down together. Whatever calamities befall us, may God in his infinite mercy vouchsafe that righteousness which is the glory and the strength of a Christian nation, and avert that sin which is the reproach and ruin of any people !

THE DANGERS OF COLLEGE LIFE.

"Ye, therefore, beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness. — 2 PETER iii. 17.

IN speaking of his early days, Mr. Gibbon observes: "Every time I have since passed over Putney Common, I have always noticed the spot where my mother, as we drove along in the coach, admonished me that I was now going into the world, and must learn to think and act for myself." I am not surprised at the deep and indelible impression which this simple fact, on account of its connections, appears to have left on the mind of the great historian. He had arrived at one of those critical periods in the life of man, where much would depend on the way in which he should begin. He had just left, perhaps for the first time, the constant and countless restraints of home; he would soon find himself in a new situation, in the midst of strange faces, beset by unaccustomed difficulties and temptations, and would there be called upon, with the scanty stock of experience he must be supposed already to have acquired, to shape his course by his own unassisted discretion as he best could.

Thus it is, that, under the same or like circumstances, the entrance of any young man into the little world of a large public school or college, where by necessity he must be left, for the most part, to think and act for himself, constitutes no ordinary trial of character. But it is a satisfaction to know that whoever sees fit to meet it with upright intentions, and a good share of forethought, self-distrust, and self-control, will find himself equal to this trial. And, if he succeeds here, it is the best earnest he can possibly give of success in after-life; for the foundation of human trial, and the foundation of our superiority to it, are everywhere substantially the same. All turns on the single question, whether we can safely be trusted with the liberty to think and act for ourselves. To do right under constraint, when we are not free to do otherwise, is nothing: one man will do it as well as another. It is only when this constraint is relaxed, and men are put to a considerable extent under their own keeping, and called upon to think for themselves and act for themselves, that the great distinctions among them arise. He only who knows how to use his liberty without abusing it, succeeds; and he who knows how to do this in one place will be likely to know how to do it in another.

As I have said, there is nothing in the trials of a college life to deter or dishearten a person of good and strong purposes. Still it would be treachery of the worst kind to hold out the lure of safety and ease, — to affirm, or to imply, or to allow it to be presumed, that the failures are not frequent, or that the dangers are not many and great. And what makes it worse in respect to many of these dangers is, that often they are not suspected, or, which amounts to the same thing in practice, not sufficiently considered until it is too late. For this reason I have thought it would be well to begin the religious instructions of the academic year by calling your attention to some of the dangers peculiarly incident to an academic life: so that, knowing these things before, you may be less likely to be led away with the error of the wicked, and fall from your own steadfastness.

One of these dangers, though occurring here, is to be referred to causes which the student brings along with him; I mean his constitutional predispositions. It was a favorite notion of some of the French philosophers, in which they were followed but too closely by our Franklin, that mankind in general come into the world with precisely the same rational endowments, all the differences which afterwards arise originating in differences of education. Few, if any, will be found to entertain this doctrine now, the tendency of common opinion and of the popular philosophy being to the opposite extreme. Great stress is now laid on distinctions of race and blood; innate and often hereditary biasses are thought to influence, and for the most part to determine, the whole life; and men are found who are fain to read in the organization of the child his future destiny. This, as I have said, is the other extreme; it supposes us to be born with propensities which it is the work of life to manifest, and not to govern and control. Obviously however it is so far founded in truth as this, that some men have strong constitutional predispositions to excess or defect in one direction, whilst others have equally strong constitutional predispositions to excess or defect in another: and hence their principal danger.

And the danger in this case is made tenfold greater, if the individual does not know himself; if he will not consider the errors to which, from his constitution and temperament, he is peculiarly exposed; in short, if from any cause he will not acknowledge even to himself his besetting sins. Some there are who are slow to confess to besetting sins of any kind, because they are not conscious of desiring any evil for its own sake ; but such persons entirely mistake what is meant by a besetting sin. A besetting sin, as here understood, does not suppose a man to desire evil for its own sake, but only that he desires something else so inordinately, that he is always in danger of doing evil in order to gratify this desire. For example ; it may be the love of ease, or the love of company, or the love of pleasure, or the love of display. Now it is not pretended that ease, or company, or pleasure, or display is bad in itself, that is to say, in its proper place and degree. But if all a man's constitutional leanings incline him to one of these forms of gratification, the danger is that, in order to gain it, he will not scruple to sacrifice or neglect more important objects, and so fall into transgression. We are not to blame for our constitutional predispositions ; we cannot help them if we would : but we can know them if we would, and we can consider them in every thing we do ; always remembering that the great question is not what is safe for others, but what is safe for us ; always remembering, also, that the price of safety is perpetual vigilance.

Another form of danger incident to college life grows out of hastily-formed and ill-assorted friendships and intimacies. One of the most perplexing facts in Divine Providence is, that we should be responsible for our characters, and yet that our characters should depend so much on the conduct of others. A young man, probably without confirmed principles, for these generally suppose long experience and a confirmed faith, but with upright intentions and good impulses, comes under the influence of a stronger mind than his own, and how apt he is to become but little more than a reflection of that stronger mind! Thus it is that the ascendancy, and the social and winning qualities, of a single bad man will blight the prospects and sometimes utterly ruin the hopes of many, not only for this world but also for the world to come. Nevertheless, it is proper to observe that in all such cases the victims are, to a certain extent, willing victims: they cannot be thus used until they consent to be thus used. Hence their fall, considered as a difficulty in Providence and a moral anomaly, is, in some measure at least, cleared up; for, by allowing others to destroy them, they may be said, in some sense, to destroy themselves.

But these are not the only ill-assorted friendships and intimacies to which a community like this may be expected to give birth. As has been intimated before, there are few persons so happily constituted by nature as not to be troubled by a constant leaning to one side or the other, which must be resisted, or they would fall. These leanings, however, are different in different persons ; and where, as sometimes happens, this is the case with intimate friends, it may even be said that the faults of one help to balance and correct the faults of the other ; so that both are made better by the intercourse. But I hardly need say, that the contrary is more likely to happen ; especially with persons of but little reflection, who are drawn together unconsciously by the very fact that they have so many tastes, or, it may be, so many failings, or so many dangerous propensities, in common. Because they like to do the same things, they are likely to go together, — the indolent with the indolent, the reckless with the reckless, the pleasure-loving with the pleasure-loving. And what is likely to be the consequence ? Plainly this, that they will encourage and stimulate each other to act out, and to act out with less and less reserve, inclinations which it should be the labor of their lives to restrain and repress. Thus, without pretensions to much power of any kind, without any bad purpose or disposition, nay, under strong and perhaps sincere professions of love and regard, they contrive to do each other precisely the greatest harm of which they are susceptible, that is, break each other down at the very point where they are least likely to recover.

Of the same general description is another danger almost sure to grow up in a community, the members of which think and act by themselves, being isolated to a considerable extent from the rest of the world. I mean the danger resulting from an artificial state of public opinion, and an artificial, and consequently more or less unsound, standard of manners and morals. It is a mistake to suppose that friendships and intimacies are forced upon us by the single circumstance that we are constrained to live together, as in a ship, a camp, or a college. Each one is still at liberty, and is generally found, in point of fact, to exercise the liberty, to choose his intimates according to his own inclinations and tastes. Over all, however, by common though it may be tacit consent, certain rules and maxims gradually acquire the authority of law, which persons possessing no more than ordinary strength and independence of character can hardly be expected to disown, or even so much as call in question. On these points, therefore, their conduct, instead of being as it ought to be a manly expression of their own individual convictions of duty, is always in danger of degenerating into a mere echo of the general voice, a timid and servile acting out of the general will.

I am not disposed to speak disparagingly, on the whole, of the sort of public opinion which is apt to be generated in a community of young men, whose bond of union is the common pursuit of liberal studies. As a general rule, I believe it is singularly free from the alloy of meanness, selfishness, and untruthfulness of every kind, and that its very errors may be traced for the most part either to an excess, or to a misapplication, of principles which are in themselves eminently good. Still, it can hardly be without permanent injury to a man's moral nature, that he should subscribe himself slave to any artificial and arbitrary rule; and besides, we must not shut our eyes on the fact that no principles have done so much harm in the world as perversions of the best principles. Some may think that there is no real danger in this case, because every student on leaving college, if not before, is found to disclaim and ridicule the rules and maxims here complained of, as a matter of course. But why disclaim and ridicule them as a matter of course, if they are felt to be just and safe? Moreover, is there no danger that the habit once formed of submitting to a factitious standard of right in the place of conscience, will be continued, the only change being in the factitious standard itself, and this, too, probably a change for the worse? Is there no danger that the habit of a weak or timid conformity here may turn out to be a training for that conformity to the world, which the gospel takes occasion to condenn more frequently and more strenuously, perhaps, than any other error or sin?

The other dangers peculiarly incident to a college life originate in mistaken notions of the nature and extent of education, and of the proper motives to study.

Let me begin what I have to say on this topic by disclaiming all sympathy with those who condemn altogether a regard for distinction as expressed in the approbation of wise and good men. In the first place, I cannot bring myself to look on such condemnation as just to human nature, or as being, in most instances at least, sincere. Furthermore, we need, we imperiously need, the good opinion of others to encourage and assure us in the course we have begun. Certainly we must not study for distinction in itself considered, but for distinction as evidence that we deserve it, — an evidence peculiarly necessary and therefore peculiarly welcome to humble, distrustful, and ingenuous minds. At the same time there is evident danger that, in the rivalries among students, they may look exclusively or mainly to immediate distinction; that they may strive for the premature; that they may not be willing to labor patiently and untiringly for a distant good; that they may think that the love of distinction may be substituted for the love of excellence. There is no such thing. An aphorism, which a truly distinguished son of this college inscribed on the walls of his studio, is applicable to every form of mental effort. "No genuine work of art ever was, or ever can be, produced but for its own sake; if the painter does not conceive to please himself, he will not finish to please the world."

Again, the student is always in danger of not sufficiently considering that the paramount object of education, and especially of a general and preliminary education, is not to fill the mind, but to strengthen and enlarge it. It has sometimes been said that the training of animals is better understood than the training of men; for in the former case the whole aim is to form the animal to the qualities required. Perhaps it will be objected that qualities cannot be taught; and this is true; but they can be developed, which amounts to the same thing in effect, the result being that those have them, who otherwise would not. Therefore it is, that, in regard to any study pursued at school, or in college, the great question is not, of what use will be the knowledge it will impart, but of what use will it be, considered as a means of exercising and disciplining the mind itself. Look at the persons who have succeeded best in the various departments of human industry; inquire into their history, and you will find them to owe their success much less to the stock of knowledge which they brought with them into active life than to their personal qualities, — that is, to previously formed habits of attention and observation, of activity, presence of mind, self-control, and the power of concentrating their entire and utmost energies on the business in hand.

But if there is danger in neglecting the cultivation of the mental qualities mentioned above, how much greater that which consists in neglecting the cultivation of the conscience and the heart! I have spoken of success in life; but a moment's reflection must convince every one that this is not the ultimate object of education. The ultimate object of education is happiness considered as the fruit of duty and usefulness. Success in life may be looked to, I grant, as one of the means of usefulness and happiness, and as such be provided for in a judicious education; but, viewed under this relation, it is not worthy to be compared with the unavoidable influences, either for good or for evil, of temper and character. The world is full of examples of what is called success in life, without any thing which deserves the name of happiness, content, or self-respect. Nay, should you have any doubts on this subject, let me ask you to bring the question to the test of your own experience. Put all you have suffered from outward adversities into one scale, and all you have suffered from a mortified vanity and pride, from a disappointed ambition, from hasty or ill-governed passions, and from a guilty conscience into the other, and see which preponderates. In short, when education, from any cause, is divorced from morals, when it is sought after and obtained as a mere power, with no security that this power will not be abused, its principal recommendation is gone, and the old question returns, not without reason, whether after all it is a blessing or a curse.

Let me conclude by adverting to a danger in education more fundamental still; I mean the danger of thinking to find any other basis for character but religious principle and the Christian faith. I speak not here of religious dogmas; but of a religious spirit, of the religious sentiment, of religion considered as an element, or rather as the foundation, of character, which is found to subsist in almost equal perfection under the greatest diversity of religious dogmas. What we need is to be trained from the beginning in the habitual recognition of the constant presence, agency, and government of Almighty God. What we need is, that our hearts, before they have become fixed and hardened by worldly influences, may be touched to higher issues, may learn to respond to higher relations and a higher destiny ; in one word, that what is divine in our own souls may be so quickened and developed as to bring us into communication with what is divine in nature, in Scripture, and in life. Let this be neglected, let the neglect become general, and I do not believe that a high and pure virtue could be maintained ; above all, I do not believe that civil liberty would be either practicable or desirable. There never has been but one experiment on a large scale, to see whether men can live together in society without religion, and you know the result. Robespierre himself, "in his remarkable discourse on the restoration of public worship, denounced atheism as inconsistent with equality, and a crime of the aristocracy ; and asserted the existence of a Supreme Being, who protects the poor and rewards the poor, as a popular consolation, without which the people would despair."

I have discoursed of the dangers and difficulties which encompass the student from the beginning. But I am unwilling to quit the subject without repeating what I have said before ; it is a pleasure and satisfaction to know that to many these dangers and difficulties exist only to be overcome, and so to be turned into occasions of triumph. To persons of good and strong purposes the promise of the gospel is fulfilled: "Behold I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall by any means hurt you."

Preëminently among such was the young member of this society, the intelligence of whose recent, sudden, and, as we in our shortsightedness are tempted to say, untimely death has filled all our hearts with sadness.<sup>1</sup> So happily was he constituted by nature, that all his prevailing tastes and inclinations seemed to be to good. Again, he could suffer but little from ill-assorted friendships and intimacies, as he was led to seek companionship only as a means of self-improvement, of generous ambition, or of innocent pastime. He also knew how to conform to the conventionalities of the place as far as a genial temper and an unselfish prudence required, without the sacrifice of that moral independence which he taught others to respect by respecting it himself. Finally, we have reason to believe that he never essentially mistook the motive or the end of a truly Christian education; which is to fit man for the performance of the highest duties from the highest principles. For ever blessed be the memory of one who has recommended goodness, by combining with the qualities which command our reverence, the qualities which win our love.

His work is accomplished. Much of ours remains to be done ; and this too, as we have seen, in the face of formidable dangers and difficulties : so much so, that it would be with a heavy heart that I should bid you go on, if I could not bid you at the same time, " God speed." " As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings, — so the Lord alone will lead you. Even the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall. But they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength : they shall mount up with wings as eagles ; they shall run and not be weary, and they shall walk and not faint."

WHITE LIES.

“For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my lie unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?” — ROMANS iii. 7.

SOME confusion has been introduced into our reasonings on moral subjects by not marking carefully the distinction between truth and veracity. Truth, in its primary acceptation, is not a quality of character, but a quality of statements. A statement is either true or false; that is, it does or does not accord with the facts in the case. But even if it be false, a man may utter it and yet not be guilty of lying; because he may utter it, believing it to be true. Such a man may be said to want the truth; that is to say he is in error, he is mistaken: but he cannot be said to want veracity; he tells the truth as he understands it. Accordingly we have no right to blame a man merely because his statements are not true. This is an objection to the statements, but it is no objection to the man, if he really thinks them to be true, and has taken proper pains to inform himself.

What we have a right to blame a man for is the want of veracity, the want of a disposition and intention to speak the truth. Here the imputation extends, as you will observe, to the man himself. It supposes something to be wrong not only in the statement, but in the man who makes the statement.

Hence it by no means follows that every false statement is a lying statement; for to make it such it must be uttered by one who believes it to be false.

A candid and generous application of this obvious distinction, in the every-day intercourse of society, would make men slower than they commonly are to impeach each other's veracity, how much soever they might still distrust each other's information or judgment. They would see that a large proportion of the popular delusions, unfounded calumnies, and idle rumors in circulation in the community, can be satisfactorily accounted for and explained, without ascribing them to intentional and deliberate perversion of the truth. I do not mean that a man who is always ready, on slight grounds, to take up with a report injuriously affecting his neighbor, and assist in spreading it, is innocent. Neither do I mean that the dealers in crude and disorganizing theories in philosophy, politics, or religion are innocent. Such men are not innocent.

Far from it. But, generally speaking, their fault does not consist in lying; that is, in a conscious purpose to deceive or mislead. Their fault consists, rather, in hasty and rash judgment, in an overweening conceit in their own abilities, in mistaking a love of novelty and paradox for a love of truth, or in not taking sufficient care to guard against a credulous turn of mind. And it is absolutely essential that he who undertakes to expose and correct their fault should consider this. How can you expect to cure a man of a fault of which he is really guilty, by accusing him of another fault of which he knows he is not guilty? These men believe what they say, just as much as you believe what you say. Their fault does not consist in saying what they do not believe; but in believing on insufficient grounds and under wrong biasses, in over-confidence in what they believe, and in the presumption and injustice to which this over-confidence leads. The weakest of all weaknesses is, to suspect everybody who differs from us of insincerity.

Most persons, perhaps, will be willing to concede this in favor of the ignorant multitude, the deluded masses, the blind followers, as they are called; but not so as regards the leaders. Such a man, we often hear it said, must know better. But he may not after all. The ways of self-mystification, the artifices of self-deceit, transcend by far, both in number and in subtilty, what is commonly supposed. And besides, credulity is an inborn propensity of some minds, so thoroughly ingrained that no kind or degree of teaching or experience can effectually work it out of their constitution. Hence we often meet with very learned and very ingenious men who are among the easiest to be imposed upon; especially if the folly or the cheat can be made to wear a learned and ingenious look. If I were bent on propagating a new extravagance, I would rather take my chance, at least in most cases, with thinking and speculative men than with plain, practical men; and for this reason. I should expect to find less difficulty in persuading the former than the latter to drop the substance and catch at the shadow, — that is to say, at a theory.

History, rightly read, confirms what has been said. If the truth were known, I suspect it would be found that, in most instances, the authors and principal instigators of the great popular delusions have differed from their followers chiefly in this, that they were among the first to be entirely carried away by the delusion. Who doubts, at the present day, that Mohammed and Cromwell entered on their career in good faith, and that, but for this, nothing but defeat and disgrace would have waited on their imbecile presumption?

I do not mean that such persons are never guilty of prevarication and insincerity in particular things, in order to help the delusion over a difficulty or round a corner ; but I do mean that in regard to the delusion itself they are generally, — not always, but generally, at least at the beginning, — honest. There is more or less of lying mingled, I am afraid, with almost every life ; but I do not believe that it is common to find a life which is built on a lie.

You will perceive how slow I am to give credit to charges of wholesale lying, which malice, jealousy, or narrow-mindedness is so ready to bring against individuals, and even against whole sects or parties. This, however, does not hinder me from suspecting and believing that there is a vast deal of lying in a small way ; and, what is more and worse, a disposition everywhere to justify or excuse it, on the ground that though these are lies, they are white lies. I have no faith in this distinction. I do not believe it has any proper foundation in reason or Scripture. Let us not be misled by names. Show that the error is not a lie ; resolve it into ignorance, misunderstanding, illusion of any kind, and all is well ; at any rate, it is not a lie : but admit it to be a lie, and I do not believe that it is in the power of any ingenuity of construction or explanation to wash it entirely white.

On this hint I am going to speak. I am not going to speak of gross lying, the baseness and turpitude of which all the world is loud enough to condemn, but of these so-called white lies, which partake as it seems to me, in different degrees, of the same baseness and turpitude, and from which in point of fact the bulk of the community have much the most to fear, both in themselves and in others.

The principal reason why so many are ready to acquiesce in the distinction in favor of white lies, is to be found in their superficial and inadequate views of what constitutes the sin of lying. They make it to consist wholly or chiefly in the harm done the individual to whom the lie is told, or, at most, in the social evils or inconveniences occasioned, directly or indirectly, thereby. Without doubt these are important considerations as far as they go, and are to be taken into account in estimating the aggravations of the offence, and the motives which should deter us from committing it; but they do not constitute the essence of the sin. The essence of the sin of lying, as such, does not consist in the injury done to others, but in the wrong done to our own souls, through the violation of that eternal law of truth which God has wrought into our moral constitution, through the stifling or overruling of the instinct or sentiment of veracity, which no man whose heart is right can do, without being self-condemned. If I purposely injure my neighbor by lying, I commit a double crime, the crime of malice and the crime of falsehood, the crime of malice in addition to the crime of falsehood. In other words, I commit one crime by means of another. And in this case, the criminality of the means does not depend on the criminality of the end; the malice does not make the lying to be criminal, any more than the lying makes the malice to be criminal: both are criminal, each in its own essential and unalterable nature. For this reason, the great question is, as it seems to me, not whether other men under certain circumstances have, or have not, a right to the truth, but whether we, under any circumstances, have a right knowingly to utter an untruth; not whether duplicity and deception will be good or evil in particular instances or in view of general consequences, but whether duplicity and deception are not evils in themselves; and if so, whether we have a right to do evil that good may come; or, for it comes to this at last, whether the end sanctifies the means.

And what say the Scriptures? "Lying lips are an abomination to the Lord." "Putting away lying, speak every man truth with his neighbor." "Ye shall not steal, neither deal falsely, neither lie one to another." "Knowing this, that the law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and sinners, for the unholy and profane, for murderers of fathers and murderers of mothers, for man-slayers, for man-stealers, for liars, for perjured persons, and if there be any other thing that is contrary to sound doctrine." I quote these passages, because to Christians they are, as it seems to me, decisive. Besides, they are full of instruction, because, in the first place, they show with what crimes lying is associated and classed in the Word of God, — with perjury and man-stealing and parricide. Not that the heinousness and turpitude of the crimes thus brought together are necessarily equal; but I think that we have a right to infer that their guilt, whatever may be its degree, is equally essential and unalterable. Again, it is still more in point to notice that, with respect to lying, there is no trace in these passages that its guilt depends on the circumstances, or the end aimed at. Nothing is said about white lies; we are not told never to lie except when we think it will be harmless, or do more good than harm; but the prohibition, according to any fair construction which I can put upon the language, is as unconditional and unqualified as that against murder, man-stealing, or theft.

If there are any on whom this appeal to Scripture is thrown away, on the ground that the Scriptures are nothing to them, let them at least consider what is universally regarded as the point of honor among men of the world. There is nothing which men, who think at all of reputation, resent so promptly and so indignantly as a questioning of their word, as a direct impeachment of their veracity. Now if the mere imputation of this crime gives such mortal affront, it must be because the crime itself is accounted one of the basest; otherwise we must conclude that the objection of a man of honor is not to being a liar, but only to being called one. Neither can we, in consistency with what is said about the disgrace of lying, make distinctions in this vice. The disgrace of lying, even in the opinion of the world, does not depend on the uses to which it is put, or on the mischief it does, but on the fact that under any and all circumstances it betrays a want of courage, manliness, and sincerity. I come, therefore, to this conclusion. Even if we lay the Bible out of the account, and look only to the standard of the world, either the exceeding sensitiveness everywhere manifested by gentlemen to the doubting of their word is mere cant and hypocrisy, or they do really feel that lying of itself, in every form and degree, leaves an indelible stain on the character.

But on a purely practical subject like the present, it is not well to stop with generalities, which nobody perhaps will dispute, and at the same time nobody will apply. Let us, therefore, descend to particulars, and, taking up some of these pretended white lies, look a little into their title to be so regarded as innocent or venial.

I shall begin with lies of custom. Here we must take care not to mix up questions which have nothing to do with each other. Custom or usage, I hardly need say, determines the meaning of language in all cases; and sometimes it gives to a whole phrase, as in the instance of the common subscription to a letter, a peculiar significance different from the one it had originally, and different from the one which grammatical construction would give. But this has nothing to do with the subject. It is enough if a man uses these phrases truly; that is to say in their customary import, so that he really means all he is understood to mean. In such a case his language stands in no need of indulgence on the plea of being a white lie. It is no lie at all; no mutual understanding is violated; no confidence is abused; nobody is deceived or misled. But if by lies of custom is meant that degree of real deception which may happen to be customary in the community, and if the doctrine is, that deception to this degree is allowable or venial, nothing can be more false and dangerous. You might just as well extend the same doctrine to other vices. You might just as well say that, where a certain degree of intemperance or knavery is customary, intemperance and knavery to that degree are innocent. Accordingly when it is said that in some professions, and in some kinds of business, a strict adherence to truth is not expected, it is not meant that it is not required, or that it is not necessary, there as elsewhere, to integrity and honor. What is meant is simply this, that, in the situations referred to, the temptation to swerve from integrity and honor is found to be too strong for the principles of most men, so that it is hardly to be expected in most men.

I turn next to lies of courtesy. Here, again, there is occasion for discrimination. There are splenetic and churlish men who condemn, without distinction or reserve, what is termed politeness in refined society, as being no better than an acted lie. But is it so, — always, I mean? What does a man profess or imply by politeness, rightly understood? Simply that he is actuated by a benevolent wish to make his presence agreeable to the company. If, therefore, he is really actuated as he ought to be, and as men sometimes certainly are, by a benevolent wish to make his presence agreeable to the company, his politeness does not lie; it speaks the truth. Genuine Christian politeness is consistent with the utmost sincerity and transparency of character. It is only when we begin to resort to falsehood and deception as a means of pleasing, and encumber those whom we meet with protestations of regard which we do not feel, and feed their vanity with flattering speeches, that our politeness begins to lie; and then it begins to be a sin, and a sin without excuse. In such cases, it is to no purpose to say that fools only are deceived; for in the first place it is not true; and in the second place, even if it were true, we have no right to deceive fools. And besides, the great mischief of such politeness is not that here and there an individual is deceived, but that, in proportion as it prevails, a general suspicion and distrust is awakened, and everybody's confidence in the openness and sincerity of social intercourse is disturbed.

From lies of courtesy I pass to lies of humanity, meaning thereby such as are told not to injure, but to benefit others, from feelings of real tenderness and concern, and not of malice. Paley includes among white lies of this description those which it is allowable to tell madmen for their own advantage. But is such conduct, speaking generally, within the strict interpretation of Christian duty? Even as regards the policy of the proceeding, those only should speak who are best qualified by their experience and observation to pronounce judgment in the case. A traveller in France, in his account of one of the principal hospitals for the insane in Paris, says that the great object aimed at by the officers is, "to gain the confidence of the patients; and this object is generally attained by gentleness, by appearing to take an interest in their affairs, by a decision of character equally remote from the extremes of indulgence and severity, and by the most scrupulous observance of good faith. Upon the last condition, particular stress seems to be laid by the head of the institution, who remarks, 'that insane persons, like children, lose all confidence and all respect, if you fail in your word to them, and they immediately set their ingenuity to work to deceive and circumvent you.'" Here we have, I doubt not, but a single illustration of what is universally true. The laws of God act together in perfect harmony; there is never any clashing between what is really expedient and what is really right; if we could see to the bottom and to the end of things, we should see that, in every case, what prudence suggests as the wisest course, and reason approves as the fittest course, conscience also enjoins as the only right course. But it is given to but few to see to the bottom and to the end of things. Hence I do not believe that it is ever safe or justifiable to let our views of expediency, always uncertain and short-sighted, and liable to be perverted unconsciously by our personal leanings, smother the moral instincts of our nature, or turn aside the acknowledged inculcations of the Divine Word, which require that the law of truth should always be in our mouth. The moment we begin to allow our notions of policy, or even of humanity, to modify or overrule our notions of right and wrong, of sincerity and deceit, we open a door to abuses which no man can shut.

On the same bad plea some think to defend a system of studied concealment, and at times even of downright prevarication and falsehood, in intercourse with the sick and dying. It is all done, we are told, from real kindness of heart ; and so perhaps it is ; but it does not follow that it is done wisely or innocently. The reason commonly assigned is, that to know the truth will discompose the sick, aggravate their disease, perhaps shorten their days. I do not believe that, in ordinary cases, there is any ground whatever for this apprehension. On the contrary, I believe that entire openness and unreservedness of communication with the sick will help, in nine cases out of ten, to brace up their energies ; in one word, that manly treatment will inspire manly feelings. Besides, as it has been justly said, " there is a peculiar inconsistency sometimes exhibited on such occasions. The persons who will not discompose a sick man for the sake of his interests in futurity, will discompose him without scruple if he has not made his will. Is a bequest of more consequence to the survivor than a hope full of immortality to the dying man? " You may allege that it is too late now for the dying man to do any thing to prepare for eternity; but this is more than you know. You do not know what, in the secrecy of his soul, he has to do, nor how long it will take him to do it, in order that he may die in peace. You do not know how much the penitence of a day, of an hour, of a minute, may serve to reconcile him to God. But to this you may reply that you are not afraid to take the risk. If you could take the risk, the answer would be pertinent, however presumptuous and unsatisfactory: but you cannot take it; for this plain reason, that it is not yours to take, but the dying man's. As, therefore, you cannot stand between him and a peril, the magnitude of which, whatever you may think about it, you do not and cannot know, there is unspeakable presumption in thus devolving it deliberately and purposely on his undying soul. The motive, I grant, may be good, so far as a mistaken tenderness and humanity may deserve this appellation: but who

that knows any thing about human nature, or has turned over the pages of history, or has moved about in society with his eyes open, has yet to learn that some of the worst evils and worst crimes to which we are liable, spring from perversion and abuse of the best feelings?

It only remains for me to say one word of what are often regarded as lies of high expediency and necessity. We have nothing to do here with stratagems in war, which are not so much lies as surprises; no confidence is violated. But where confidence is violated, it is by no means clear that any degree of expediency, even of moral expediency, or that any pressure of necessity, will authorize or excuse a conscious departure from the law of truth. Undoubtedly it is perfectly natural that a good man should desire to keep up the spirits of those who are acting with him in what he holds to be a righteous cause; but if this cannot be done except by means of false pretences, it is better that their spirits should flag. Viewed in the light of expediency alone, he will find, I suspect, in the long run, not only that truth is better than boasting, but that truth is better than immediate or apparent success. Again, it is perfectly natural that a man should wish to preserve his life, nay, that he should think it expedient to do so, even though at some expense of sincerity; and this, too, not from private but from public considerations, out of regard to the important services he may in that event be able to render the cause of truth and humanity. Is it certain, however, that he cannot do more to build up that cause by dying for it in good faith, without any stain on his honor or purity, than by living for it and laboring for it under the reproach of a tarnished name? Who does not know that the Church, for one example, actually gained more in influence and power from the blood of the holy martyrs, than from the more wily policy and the more protracted services of her temporizing friends? Nor is it to be forgotten that the threatened evils, to be averted by the lie, ought never to be set down as certain. The open and fearless avowal of the truth commands respect, inspires awe, even among bad men; and the intrepidity of one's behavior in making this avowal, the sobriety and dignified moderation of his courage, and the reasonableness of his expostulations may be such as to disarm a fiend.

But it is not given to all men to be heroes; hence we should be slow to judge one another in these high requisitions. It is enough to say that the general plea for lies of expediency and lies of necessity should be questioned at every step. It is to dishonor the character and government of God, to suppose that he has made it expedient or necessary in the constitution of the universe, that men should lie, thus requiring in his works what he has forbidden in his Word. It is possible that good men may occasionally fall into this error, and still be entitled to be regarded as good men; but they are not perfect men. To prove this, take the perfect character of Jesus,—suppose him, in any case whatever, to have resorted to falsehood or artifice, either to save his own life or that of his friends, to avert any calamity however formidable, or to hasten the triumph of his cause, though that cause was the salvation of the world: who does not perceive that it would sink immeasurably the veneration now inspired by his spotless and peerless virtue?

We may be unable effectually to promote a worthy object except by some sacrifice of truth and sincerity. If so, then it is certain that God does not call on us to aid in that work, and we should leave it to other and more suitable agents whom God will raise up in his own time. Omnipotence can accomplish its eternal purposes without our help; certainly without the help of our sins. Let us put more trust in God. If we would put more trust in God, we should find occasion to put less trust in ourselves, and less still in the world, and none at all in lies.

HOW TO MAKE THE SUN STAND STILL.

A NEW YEAR'S SERMON.

“So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day.” — JOSHUA x. 13.

SEVERAL Hebrew books are referred to by the sacred writers, which are now lost. Among these is the book of Jasher, being, as the name would seem to import, a collection of odes or ballads in which the exploits of the great men of antiquity were celebrated. One of them appears to have contained a highly poetical description of the victory which Joshua gained over the five confederate kings; in the course of which he is represented as commanding the sun to stand still: and it obeyed him.

Many of the best scholars, Catholic as well as Protestant, agree in making this passage signify that the defeat which the Hebrews inflicted on the Canaanites was as great as if the sun had stopped in the midst of heaven, and had thus prolonged the day to twice its usual length. This construction of the narrative may be correct, or not; at any rate it suggests, as a fit topic for discourse at the commencement of another year, the only way in which we can make the sun stand still. The amount of work accomplished by us must be as great as if it had stood still. Our days on earth were numbered from the beginning: many of them are finished; if, however, from this time we double our diligence in what we have to do, it will have the effect to make each remaining day twice as long. In other words, it will be the same in effect as if Joshua's miracle were repeated, in respect to us, every day.

To enter into the truth and full significancy of this statement, it will be necessary to consider for a moment the nature of time itself, and the customary modes of measuring time.

You remember the old reply to the question, What is time? "If you do not ask me, I know." The same might be said of many other things, and for the same reason. It is because the common occasions of life make us familiar with them under some of their aspects, and we mistake this familiarity for knowledge until called upon to state what we know. Thus everybody is familiar with time under some of its aspects, and this familiarity with it is mistaken for a proper and full understanding of it. We think we know it already, and this conceit hinders us from ever so much as trying to obtain profounder views. In saying this, I do not mean that men are bound to trouble themselves with metaphysical subtilities on this subject or on any other; but it will not do, under color of the common prejudice against metaphysics, to reject and disown all serious and profound thought. There is, I believe, a great deal of superficial living, which has its origin in superficial thinking. Thus much at least is plain, that we should seek to extend our knowledge of the nature of time if it can be shown to be of importance in any way to faith or morals, and especially if we find aid and encouragement in doing so, in the Word of God.

The first general remark which I have to make respecting time is, that, according to Scripture as well as reason, it is not the same to God as it is to men: he is not subject to it, as we are. "But, beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." By reason of the limitations of the human mind we are unable to consider more than one thing at once; so that, if many things are to be considered, they must be considered one after another ; that is, successively : and succession supposes what we call time. All events exist therefore to the human mind subject to the conditions and laws of time ; but we have no right to conclude that this holds true of a being who has none of our limitations, — of an absolute and infinite being like God. What we apprehend successively, he grasps at once, — the past, the present, and the future ; for it is no more certain that he exists at once, in every point of space, than it is that he exists at once in every instant of duration : and therefore it is said of him that he inhabiteth eternity.

Of course we cannot conceive how this can be, because we, in our modes of immediate existence and knowledge, are limited to the present, to the here and the now ; but we must not presume to impose our limitations on God, or make our necessities the standard of his. The fact itself which this doctrine teaches, we can understand, and this is all we are called upon to believe ; and so much it is of great practical moment that we should believe. For it shows the vanity of the sinner's hope, who counts on the long delays of the divine justice as a ground of immunity or escape. "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil." This could hardly be if they remembered that what is a long time to us is not so to God; or, in other words, that his measures of time are not like ours. We measure one time by another; he measures all times by eternity. With him therefore one day must be as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day; so that what seems to us to be separated by long intervals, by long delays, is to him but the constant, eternal, ever-present unfolding of his immutable purpose.

The second general remark which I have to make in this connection is, that, even for us, there are no absolute measures of time; that is to say, no time which is absolutely short or absolutely long. Here, again, it is the same with time as it is with space; there being no absolutely great, no absolutely small, space. "If"—to borrow a familiar illustration—"any one were to affirm that the universe was continually growing less and less, all the parts altering in the same proportion, and the dimensions of the human race with the rest, in such manner that the whole solar system would now go into a nut-shell, such as nut-shells were a thousand years ago,—it would be impossible either for him to prove it, if true, or for any one else to prove the contradiction, if false. In like manner, if any one were to say that the revolutions of all the heavenly bodies were continually accelerating, but that the properties of matter were also continually altering, and the speed with which ideas are formed and communicated, and muscular efforts made, continually increasing, —it would be impossible to prove a contradiction.” It would seem, therefore, that there is no absolute standard to which we can appeal, in our measurements of time. We sometimes say that a day is a day, or that a year is a year, whether much or little takes place in it, whether we can give any account of it or not; but this does not follow. After all, a day or a year is not a measure of time, properly so called, but of a series of events, of a definite series of events, which might be quickened or retarded to any extent without our knowing or suspecting it, provided only that all other events were quickened or retarded in the same proportion. We sometimes pass whole days and years in a dream, yet find on waking, that we have been asleep but a few minutes, as measured by the clock. This is commonly accounted for, I know, by saying that in the dream we mistake thoughts for events; but who will assure us that the events themselves might not be crowded into the same space, supposing all other things to be adjusted to this new ratio of speed.

But it is not necessary to dwell in these transcendental regions. It is enough if we have seen that the common divisions of time are "as nothing" in the sight of God, and that they have no absolute value even with men.

My next general remark is, that in our practical estimates of time, and in common conversation, we call the same period long or short according to the subject with which it is connected or compared. Thus, to live fourscore years is a long life now, but it would have been a short one, mere childhood, among the antediluvians. Fifty years make a large portion of the life of a man, but would not be accounted much in the life of a nation ; so the history of a dynasty or an empire. A thousand years are a long period even in the history of nations and empires, but would be regarded as a short one, as a mere day, in the history of the earth itself, or of the solar system, or of the stellar universe. Accordingly in the Mosaic account of the creation, the "days" are thought by some to stand for geological eras, each one of which is supposed to have consisted of countless myriads of centuries.

But I need not multiply arguments and illustrations to prove, that, whenever we speak of a long time or a short time, it is comparatively, and not absolutely. One thing, however, in this connection, is particularly worthy of note. The period of discipline and preparation is always short in comparison with the period of maturity and enjoyment. Speaking generally and practically, our whole success in this life depends on fidelity during the half-a-dozen years in which we are fitting ourselves for it. I do not mean that there are no labors and trials afterwards, but fidelity during these few years will prepare us to meet such labors and trials; for it is the business of education to determine, not only what a man will be, but what he will do. Still more obvious and impressive is this difference, when we consider the present life as a preparation for the life to come. Has it never crossed your mind, with what unspeakable agony the lost soul will see at last, that, by fidelity during a few short years of probation, it might have secured a whole eternity of holiness and bliss?

Thus far I have spoken of time and its common measurements in their relations to mankind. I pass, in the next place, to speak of them in their relations to the individual.

Whatever time may be in itself, or whatever it may be to others, it is nothing to me if unattended by conscious thought. Of this, considered strictly as a physiological fact, there is abundant evidence in cases of sound sleep, of swoons, and of injuries, occasioning a long-continued suspension of consciousness. Accordingly it is no objection to the doctrine of what is called "The Sleep of the Soul," whether that doctrine be well or ill founded in other respects, to say that it separates life by a vast interval from its retributions; for if a person were really to sleep, with a perfect suspension of all mental operations, from this time until a general resurrection of the dead, the whole of that period would appear to him, and would be to him, but an instant. Hence it would seem to follow, as regards the individual at least, that time is not the measure of life, but life is the measure of time; so that, if we would know how long he has lived, we must ascertain how much he has done.

To this it may be objected, that time never seems so short as when we are most busily engaged, and the succession of our thoughts is the quickest; as in exciting scenes, or in interesting company and conversation. Here the fallacy consists in confounding a sense of the rapid passage of time with a sense that not much is passing. In the circumstances just mentioned, the time seems to be shorter in passing; but when it is passed, and we are able to look back upon it, and see it altogether, and so can apply a measure to the whole, it seems to be longer. Thus on a journey, the mind being occupied by a constant succession of diverting objects, the time seems very short while passing, very long in retrospect; and the same is true of the whole of life when it resembles such a journey. A day filled with twenty good deeds does not drag like a day which has witnessed only one; but the amount of satisfaction actually enjoyed by us in the course of it, is twenty times as great, and it is felt in the retrospect to be twenty times as long. I repeat it, therefore; life, true life, is not measured by the motion of the heavenly bodies, nor by the motion of the index on the dial-plate of the clock, but by the aggregate of what we have thought and done. He who has lived much, has lived long. In the calendar of heaven, "honorable age is not that which standeth in length of time, nor that is measured by number of years; but wisdom is the gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age."

Who is there whose life does not bear testimony to the truth of the doctrine here advanced? Who is there, who, in great emergencies, has never had a single day so crowded with useful and virtuous activity, that, when night came on, he felt that he had lived to some purpose, and looking back on it afterwards has been more than once disposed to exclaim, "Oh, that all my days were such"? Do you wish to know how this prayer may be fulfilled? Simply by doing for yourselves what, in the cases referred to, the emergency did for you. The emergency has revealed us to ourselves. It has awakened in us powers and capacities which we did not know before that we possessed; but we now know that we possess them, and that we can put them forth at will. What therefore a pressure from without has made us do once or twice, we should make ourselves do continually by pressure from within,—the untiring urgency of a quickened conscience, a lofty purpose, and an immortal hope. In this respect the children of light would do well to take a lesson from the children of this world. When ambition or avarice takes entire possession of the soul, it does not act like an occasional emergency; neither is the influence which it exerts of the nature of a pressure from without: it is a perpetual pressure from within, stimulating those who feel it to incessant effort. They rest not day and night, crowding the work of years into months, and so turning months into years. “Now they do it to obtain a corruptible crown;” might not, ought not we to do as much “to obtain an incorruptible”?

All the preceding observations tend therefore to this; that the common distinctions, and the common notation of time are of comparative unimportance to an earnest and determined mind. Holy thoughts and good deeds, and not the pendulum of the clock, determine the measure of a life approved and accepted of God.

“He most lives,
Who thinks most, feels the noblest, acts the best.”

Tried by this standard, how is it with you and me? When the year which has just closed, began, we had so much to do, and but so much time in which to do it. The year has gone; has a year's work been done? or have we suffered the work to accumulate on our hands? Have we done as much as we thought we should do, or as we meant to do? I am afraid there is not one among us all who can answer this question to his own entire satisfaction; or, if he can, I am afraid that the satisfaction itself is evidence that he has made no progress. Have you entirely mastered and corrected a single bad habit, a single bad propensity, a single infirmity of temper? Can you remember many instances in which you have borne provocation without malice, generously forgiven the wrong-doer, and overcome evil with good? Have you been ready to assist the needy, not only when it was easy to do so, but also when it called for self-denial and sacrifice? Can you remember a single friend or associate, who, as you have reason to believe, owes a single virtue to your example or your counsels? Let an awakened and an enlightened conscience pursue these inquiries, and the best of us would soon be convinced — perhaps the best of us would soonest be convinced — of how small a portion of the past year we can give a good and perfectly satisfactory account. Are you sure that all the good you have done in the twelve months might not have been crowded into a single week, or a single day? If it might have been, then remember that, according to the only measure of time which we know in heaven, the twelve months shrivel up into that brief space. You have not lived a year; you have only lived a week, or, it may be, a day.

From the past let us now turn to the future, — from the year that has just closed to that which has just begun. If a large proportion of the great and solemn work of life still remains to be accomplished in the ever narrowing term allotted us on earth, we may be tempted to cry out with the Hebrew chieftain in the hot pursuit of a half-vanquished foe, “Sun! stand thou still!” Vain and presumptuous expectation, if we look for its literal fulfilment! The lights which God has set in the firmament of heaven, to “be for signs, and for seasons, and for days and years,” will hold on their course. What then can we do? It is often said that the formation of character is a slow work. If so, this is not a reason for being slow to begin; it is a motive for despatch. It used to be a common supposition that, where thirteen persons met at a feast, one of the number might be expected to die within the year. How much more certain that, before another annual revolution is completed, more than one of the number here present, and those perhaps who least expect it, will be summoned to give account of themselves to God. On the great and awful themes here involved, — God, Christ, the soul, retribution, eternity, — I do not think that the speculations of the wisest uninspired man are worth much. I turn to the Scriptures; and here I think I find that the only probation expressly allotted to man is the probation of this life. Without necessarily implying that the future state is a fixed state either to the good or the bad, it seems to me that the doctrine nevertheless is, that we choose sides here, with no reason to expect that we shall have either the disposition or the opportunity to change sides hereafter. Under the pressure of this infinitely momentous alternative, I ask again, What shall we do?

Though we cannot make the sun stand still in the midst of heaven, we can do what, as we have seen, will be the same in effect. By putting the work of two days into one, we can make one day equal to two. By crowding the year that is before us with generous purposes, and virtuous efforts, and noble sacrifices, we can make it equal to twenty years of ordinary life. It is sometimes said that the repentance which is to save us, is not the repentance of a day; and this is true, if all the fruits of repentance are meant to be included. But the repentance which consists in a solemn and religious change of intention and of heart, which supposes an inward and radical change of one's whole plan of life, so as to take him out of the class of the bad, and put him into the class of the good,—this is, or at least may be, not only the repentance of a day, but of an hour: I had almost said of a moment, of any moment,—of this moment. Afterwards we have nothing to do but to go on. If we are living when this year expires, consider, I beseech you, what unspeakable satisfaction it will give us to be assured that we are in the right and only safe path; that the interval has been lengthened out to twice, to quadruple, to tenfold its usual dimensions, considered as a measure of real life, by the number and excellence of the deeds with which it has been filled; that every day has been a step towards heaven. Remember, also, that our enjoyment of this satisfaction at that time will depend, not on what we wish then, but on what we determine, and on what we do, now.

XIX.

ON THE SIN OF BEING LED ASTRAY.

“My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not.” — PROVERBS i. 10.

WHEN a young man falls into evil courses, it is common for his friends to find such consolation as they can in the thought that he was led astray. His original purposes and dispositions were good; he would have done well enough if left to himself; but he fell into vicious companionships, and was led astray. And this is often said in a tone which would seem to imply that the victims, in such cases, are objects of pity, rather than of blame.

But is it so? I do not forget that there are, as there always have been, “corrupters of youth,” men who lie in wait for the innocent and inexperienced in order to entice them into sin. Neither do I forget that the strongest language of reprobation fails adequately to express the guilt of such persons. But, if there is sin in enticing, there is also sin in yielding to the enticement; nay, my object in this discourse will be to show, that the difference is by no means so great as is commonly supposed.

Those who think to excuse men's delinquencies, on the ground that they did not commit them of their own accord, but were led into them by others, should consider that on this ground all delinquencies might be excused, — even those of our first parents. Adam complained that he was led astray by Eve, and Eve, that she was led astray by the serpent; but we do not find that the plea was accepted, or listened to, in either case. And so it has been ever since. Men do not become sinners of their own accord, of their own motion, that is to say, without being tempted to become so; and in almost every instance, the temptation comes, directly or indirectly, through other men. We are led astray. Nevertheless, our sins are sins. Even those who now lead others astray, began by being led astray themselves; so that if this is an excuse for either, it is an excuse for both — for all. And besides, virtue does not grow up in the absence of all enticement to sin, but in the presence and in the resistance of such enticement; and it is this resistance which makes it to be virtue.'

Look again at the nature of this excuse. "They would have done well enough if left to themselves, because they started in life with good purposes and dispositions." But when this is urged,

I am afraid that, in a vast majority of cases, their purposes and dispositions are called good merely because they are not bad; or rather, perhaps, because they have no fixed purposes and dispositions of any kind. And here there is no occasion to take the ground of high and unreasonable expectations. We do not expect men to start in life with a fixed character; for character is made up of habits, and the formation of habits is the work of time. All that we expect or have a right to insist upon is, that every one should start in life with fixed purposes and dispositions; that is to say, not merely with a willingness, but with a strong determination, to do well. But if a man is led astray by the common enticements incident to human trial, it proves that he was without this strong determination; so that the excuse fails. Good-natured, he may have been; but good nature, as that term is commonly understood, is much more frequently the sign of an easy than of a determined mind: and where this is the case, where good nature stands for nothing better than ease and pliancy of temper, instead of being an excuse for any thing else, it needs itself to be excused; at any rate, it is evidence of moral infirmity and danger.

Again; those who try to find an excuse for their delinquencies in the fact that they were led astray by others, are apt to exaggerate these enticements, as if to intimate that resistance under such circumstances was out of the question. In short, throughout the whole of the affair, they take a course perversely opposite to that which prudence and duty dictate. While the danger is in prospect, and they should be put on their guard against it, they make light of it; but after it has come, and done its work, they can then see it in all and more than all its magnitude, and find there a reason and an excuse for their fall.

In point of fact the danger, except to a comparatively small number, is neither so great, nor so imminent, as is generally thought. Let me not be misunderstood. We must make distinctions here. I do not forget that one of the greatest difficulties in Providence is found in the degree to which our conduct and characters are left to depend on others, while we ourselves are made to suffer the consequences in this world and the next. But the influence, and often the controlling influence, which other men have over our conduct and characters, is, for the most part, general and indirect. That is to say, it comes for the most part through a bad or neglected education, through a perverted or low state of public opinion, through the prevalence and perhaps the popularity of corrupting customs and institutions, and the like; and not through a direct instigation to particular sins.

When any one yields to such direct instigation, it proves, as it seems to me, one of two things; either that he is more than usually weak-minded, or that he has a strong natural proclivity in the same direction. Consider how it is where large numbers are thrown together, and are under the necessity of living together for a considerable time. They immediately fall into distinct associations and companionships, according to their several tastes and habits; the great majority, as we are willing to believe, to follow out plans of usefulness or pleasure which they have chosen for themselves; a few to be led about, and made fools of, by any one who will take the trouble to do it; and who these few are, can generally be determined before they have been together six weeks.

I might go farther, and say that bad men seldom try to lead astray any except those who show beforehand a willingness to be thus led. We are apt to make men of loose principles and dissipated habits worse than they really are. They are not monsters; they are still men, and have many, at least, of the feelings and sentiments natural to men. They may be, and probably are, unduly disposed to suspect appearances; they have no respect for hypocrisy, and exult in its exposure: but whenever they meet with an example of modest and consistent virtue, they do not, and they cannot resist the instinctive tendency of their nature to admire it. When these men read history, the characters whom they most admire are the same whom good men most admire; — not the triflers and profligates of the day, that is, the men who most resemble themselves, but the heroes, and, high above all, the moral heroes. With such feelings it is hardly to be supposed that they would deliberately plot the ruin of the very persons, whom in common with the rest of the community, they sincerely respect and revere.

But, it may be said, there are worse men than these; and so there are, — fiends in human shape, who would take perhaps a satanic delight in the fall, if it were possible, “of the very elect.” Few however, as I suppose all will agree, attain to this pitch of wickedness. They are monsters; and what have the well disposed to do with monsters, known as such, except to avoid them? “Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird.” It is not by monsters in crime that the innocent and inexperienced are most in danger of being led astray, at least in the first instance, but by those who have as yet proceeded only a little way in crime; whose crime consists, for the most part, in an uncontrolled love of ease and pleasure, gilded over with companionable qualities, and sometimes by real kindness of heart. These are the dangerous men; but dangerous to whom? In the case of such tempters it is idle, as I have said, to talk about a satanic purpose to corrupt virtue, as virtue. What motive is therefore left to induce them to take the trouble to lead another astray, but this; that they see in him congenial propensities, — a strong natural tendency to the same pleasures and unlawful gratifications; and this tendency they may help to develop a little sooner, though it probably would have been developed sooner or later without their aid.

I come therefore to these three conclusions. In the first place, a large proportion of those who are led astray are led astray by themselves, by their own evil thoughts; in the language of Scripture, “they are drawn away of their own lust, and enticed.” Sometimes the temptation does not take the form of a natural taste or inclination for the vice itself, but that of a morbid curiosity to know what the vice is; yet in the latter case, as well as in the former, they are led astray by themselves, by their own evil thoughts. In the second place, a large proportion of those who are led away by others, purposely put themselves in the way of it; the bad company do not seek them out, but they seek out the bad company. They know, as well as others, that the community consists of two sorts of persons, the safe and the dangerous, the industrious and the idle, the virtuous and the vicious; and, knowing this, they nevertheless voluntarily connect themselves with the obnoxious class. As a general rule, therefore, they can hardly be said to be led away by the wicked; they join the wicked, differing from older transgressors in this only, that they were the last to join,—not veterans, but recruits. And, in the third and last place, the very fact that an attempt is made to lead a man astray is strong evidence against him. Men of unquestionable probity and moral inflexibleness are never spoken to, are never thought of, in this connection. The emissaries of evil know what they are about: they seldom approach any but such as they are convinced, by almost infallible signs, will turn out easy and willing victims. Hence it is a bad sign, I do not say merely that a man should be led astray, but that he should be singled out for this purpose; that his virtue should be even so much as attempted, is proof that all is not right.

Still it cannot be denied that melancholy cases do occur from time to time, in which persons, merely through ignorance and inexperience, are led astray by artful and designing men,—persons, too, who, under other influences and in other companionships, might have succeeded in life, and become useful and perhaps distinguished members of society. Nothing should be left undone which will help to save such persons; above all, they should be conjured to consider, before it is too late, the weakness, the guilt, and the ruin which consenting to be led astray involves.

Consider, in the first place, the weakness which such conduct supposes and involves. Moral strength, that is, the strength which is the opposite to the weakness here intended, constitutes what is called personality; it makes the distinction between a person and a thing, between a self-active, self-determining being, and one who moves only as he is moved. Some there are who manifest so little of this strength, as almost to leave us in doubt under which head they ought to be classed; they are never among the leaders, but always among the led: they are not so much persons as things, that is, appendages to persons. And here it is to no purpose to object that only a few can lead; the rest must follow: that the great majority in every community, from the necessities of their condition, or from want of information or natural ability, must follow. Certainly they must; but what has that to do with the subject in hand? There is a world of difference between following a man because we choose to follow him, and being led by him because he chooses to lead us. There is also a world of difference between following others because we think they will lead us aright, our own judgment approving the course, and following others when we know or suspect they will lead us astray, our own judgment disapproving the course. The only independence I am contending for here, is moral independence; an independence which refuses to follow when reason and prudence and conscience say, No! And this independence may exist, and does exist, in all classes; nay, is quite as often found in the humblest classes as the highest, among the uneducated as among the educated.

What I insist upon is, that a want of this independence, wherever met with, betrays the worst form of weakness. We call a man morally weak, who is led astray by his own passions; and so he is, for it shows that, however strong he is in himself, his passions are stronger still: he is weak relatively to his own passions. But a man who is led astray by other men shows that he is weak in himself, absolutely weak. This distinction must be taken into account in making up our judgment respecting many of the leading characters in history. Such men as Cæsar and Cromwell and Napoleon were not strong in the sense of having the mastery over their own passions, but in that of having the mastery of every thing else. They owed their ascendancy, not more to the power they had over others, than to the fact that others had no power over them in return; this circumstance giving a unity and persistence to their purpose, which made success almost certain. And so in business, so in scholarship, so in every walk and pursuit of life ; one of the great secrets of personal and successful efficiency is found in making ourselves inaccessible to the influence of others any farther than we choose. It is only in this condition that we are safe against being turned aside from our own plans, against being laughed out of our own seriousness, against losing our own courage in the general distrust or timidity. We must be true to ourselves, whatever others may do or say. Just so far as we fall from this moral independence, we fall into pitiable weakness. — a weakness which not only supposes frailty, the frailty common to all, but a loss of proper personality, the loss of proper manhood. We become the shadows, the echoes, the tools of other men, and so are liable at any moment to become their dupes and victims.

Consider, in the next place, the guilt which is involved in being led astray. Guilt, as I have intimated before, does not consist in sinning in the absence of all temptation. Probably no such sin was ever yet committed by man or fiend ; it would be to act without a motive. Sin and guilt consist in yielding to temptation. “ If sinners entice you,” it will doubtless add to the temptation, and so make it more likely that you will commit the sin ; but it does not make the sin any the less a sin, either in its nature or consequences. But some will ask, If another man inveigles me into crime, is not he in some sense responsible for the crime ? Certainly he is. It is remarkable of a crime committed by one person at the instigation of another, that two persons are guilty of it, and two persons will have to answer for it. But the question will still be pressed, Is not the instigator in this case unspeakably the more guilty of the two ? And here, too, I answer as before, Certainly he is, if guilt is to be measured by wickedness of purpose in the outset. But this is not the only or the best way of estimating the moral harm incurred by wrong-doing. The best and only legitimate gauge of the gravity of a transgression is found, not in the state of mind in which it is committed, but in the state of mind which it produces in those who commit it. What and how much effect does it have in retarding, arresting, or reversing our moral progress ? Tried by this test, I suspect it will often appear that the led are more thoroughly demoralized than the leaders. The reason is that the leaders are generally men of some strength of mind, and can stop when they please in a course of self-indulgence ; often also their ambition and better instincts help to hold their love of pleasure in check. But not so with their imbecile dupes and victims. Hence it not infrequently happens that the very person who was the first to lead another astray, who taught him his first lessons in crime, soon becomes ashamed of his follower, and disgusted with his excesses, and casts him off.

It only remains for me to speak of the ruin which men bring on themselves by yielding to the enticement of sinners. Here, unhappily, there can be but one opinion. We may differ as to the share of guilt incurred by those who are not the originators, but merely the instruments and tools, in the mischief; our pity for their weakness may also do much to blind us to their criminality; but we cannot shut our eyes on the reality of the distress they bring on their friends, or the final and utter ruin they bring on themselves. How often have we been told that our prisons are filled, not only by those who contrived the wrong and perhaps profited by it, but by those whom they used as instruments and tools to carry their purposes into effect! The leaders escape; the followers are disgraced and punished. And so in respect to the fashionable views of society. Who are they who suffer most from these in the loss of property, reputation, and health? Not the leaders, who commonly know how to keep themselves out of the worst dangers and the worst excesses, but their unwary and facile followers; — followers, too, who sometimes have no taste for a dissipated life and find no real pleasure in it, but yet are willing to plant unspeakable anguish in the hearts of all who love them, and bring a fatal blight on their own prospects, merely for the honor of being noticed and flattered by dangerous and profligate men.

Would to God that what I have said might have the effect to put a single unwary soul on its guard against this peril! As has been intimated before, in every place, in every community, the associations and companionships are of two kinds, — the safe and the dangerous. There are men whose presence is a blessing and a benediction; whose company and conversation have the effect to confirm our faith, to strengthen all our good purposes, and fill the future with bright visions of honor, success, and usefulness. Again, there are those in whose company you cannot be for half an hour without feeling that virtue has gone out of you; “their feet go down to death, their steps take hold on hell.” You are to make your choice between them; and remember, it is for your life!

XX.

THE YOUNG MAN'S DREAM OF LIFE.

A BACCALAUREATE SERMON.

“And he dreamed yet another dream, and told it his brethren, and said, Behold, I have dreamed a dream more; and, behold, the sun and the moon and the eleven stars made obeisance to me. And he told it to his father, and to his brethren: and his father rebuked him, and said unto him, What is this dream that thou hast dreamed? Shall I and thy mother and thy brethren indeed come to bow down ourselves to thee to the earth? And his brethren envied him; but his father observed the saying.”—GENESIS xxxvii. 9, 10, 11.

HUMAN nature is substantially the same now as in the days of the Hebrew patriarch. What is related of Joseph,—his father's manifest partiality, the fine clothes, and, above all, the two vain-glorious dreams, as they must have seemed at the time,—would be too much for the patience of most elder brethren. The bowing of the sheaves was bad enough; but when he dreamed again, and made not only “the eleven stars,” that is, all his brethren, who, with one exception, were considerably older than he, but also “the sun and moon,” that is, his father and mother, do him obeisance, it was too much even for the dotting fondness of Jacob himself. Accordingly we are told that "his father rebuked him, and said unto him, What is this dream that thou hast dreamed? Shall I and thy mother, and thy brethren, indeed come to bow down ourselves to thee to the earth?"

The bold and confident aspirations of the strippling, as he stood in the family group, and told his dreams with so much simplicity, and we are tempted to add with so much imprudence, must have offended against Oriental notions of propriety even more than they would against ours. In the East, to the present day, immobility reigns; the future is expected to be merely a repetition of the past: experience, therefore, is wisdom, is every thing; age is looked up to with reverence; elders is another name for rulers. But with us it is not so. Among the Western nations, and especially among those of the race to which we belong, there has grown up from small beginnings a spirit of progress. Truth and right are looked for, not in the past, but in the future; and under the influence of this habit of thought, popularized and made universal, we cannot wonder that what is called the spirit of progress should often degenerate into a passion for change and reform. Some writers are fond of charging the whole movement, with all its good and all its evil issues, on the Protestant Reformation; but they mistake one of the effects of the cause for the cause itself. The movement began long before, and the Protestant Reformation was neither more nor less than one of its important results. And it is still going on. Reactions there have been, and will be, on the surface; but the deep under-currents are the same as heretofore, betraying themselves, when excessive, in contempt for every thing that is old, in disdain for experience and for the wisdom derived from experience. Hence, there is but too much ground for the complaint of one of the most liberal and just thinkers of the present century, that "the young man of to-day measures himself with the man of many years; before his school-days are over, the boy thinks and declares himself equal to his sire. This notion of equality of minds is carried so far that the judgment of eighteen has as much authority as that of fifty; and the reasoning of a day-laborer, on a question of policy, is considered as decisive as that of a statesman whose whole life has been passed in the midst of public affairs, or of a student grown gray in thought."

But there are two important considerations which the persons who are fond of dwelling on this topic are apt to overlook. In the first place, they forget how differently young men are educated now than formerly. Education, meaning thereby artificial and systematic education, is not intended to supply the place of natural ability, or to train minds which otherwise would not be trained at all; but simply to facilitate and expedite this training, and make it more thorough and comprehensive. Thus understood, it may be said in a certain sense, and to a certain extent, to be a substitute for experience: the thoroughly educated man is, in some respects, as old at twenty-one, as the uneducated at thirty or thirty-five. Why wonder, then, that he should speak and act, as if he were as old? Why deliberately apply these forcing processes, and afterwards affect to wonder and complain at the obvious and necessary result? Why multiply the arts of bringing forward and pushing forward young men into society, and afterwards affect to wonder and complain at finding them where you have chosen to put them? Again, it is to be considered that, in this country at least, many of the objects and pursuits, which once took up and occupied the exuberant ambition and activity of young men, have failed almost entirely. Only a very few can go into the army: the well educated are not busily engaged here, as in some other countries, in making their way at court; neither is there demand here for that high refinement, for that elaborate though superficial culture, which is expected in an aristocratical constitution of society. What, then, are our young men to do? Failing other objects of interest, is it at all wonderful that they should turn to politics or reform? that they should mix with their elders in important social action, or undertake to act by themselves, though at the risk of sometimes intermeddling with matters beyond their years?

However this may be, it is certainly natural that those who are just entering on life, and those who are soon to quit it, should differ in their views of life itself. The reason is, that the latter know what life is; they know it through and through, from actual experience; they know its early promises, and how far these promises are likely to be fulfilled, and how far unfulfilled. On the contrary, those who are just entering on life see but a single phase of it; the rest is hearsay, theory, conjecture, imagination. Like Joseph, they dream what will happen to them: awake or asleep, it matters not, still it is a dream, — the young man's dream of life. And this is my subject; not inappropriate, as it seems to me, either to the occasion or the place. Be assured, however, in the outset, that I have not selected this subject with a view to treat it lightly, or satirically, or irreverently. I believe that the young man's dream of life may come to pass, as in the case of Joseph; nay, more, that the dream itself often works its own accomplishment. Neither is this all: I believe there is often more wisdom, and more dignity, and more humble trust, in the young man's dream of life, than in the old man's philosophy of life. What I am anxious to do is simply this:— to call your attention to a remarkable discrepancy in these dreams; to impress you with the fact, that, while some of these dreams are true to our nature and our destiny, and lead to nothing but good, there are others which are false to our nature and our destiny, and lead to nothing but evil.

To the last-mentioned class belongs the dream of a life of ease and pleasure and self-indulgence.

The great law which applies to other dreams holds good also here: every man's dream of life is shaped and determined, for the most part, by his constitutional tendencies, and his antecedent habits of thought and experience. For this reason, it is chiefly among such as are born to wealth, and brought up amidst luxury and abundance, that we look for the mistaken anticipations of life of which I now speak. Up to the present time, theirs has been a life of ease and pleasure and self-indulgence, and they are fain to believe that it will be so to the end. But they forget, in the first place, the rotatory nature of family fortunes, at least in this country. With us, the law of inheritance and the distribution of property are such, that a rich man's son can hardly expect any thing more than to have his way made easy in the beginning, and to be helped a little afterwards; with the danger, too, that this expectation will take just so much from his self-reliance, and from his earnest and determined preparation to help himself. Even here it is not impossible, I know, that a family should continue rich through several generations; but it is only on condition that they continue distinguished for habits of thrift and frugality, thus excluding the thought of a life of ease, pleasure, and self-indulgence. Moreover, this is not the rule, but the exception to the rule; the rule is vicissitude; while one goes up, another comes down, not requiring, as it has been found by experience, more than three, or at most four, generations for the wheel to effect an entire revolution. If a class of young men, anywhere collected together in this country, could look forward to what will be their relative social position thirty years from this time, it would lead them to attach much less importance to what their relative social position is now.

Assuming, however, that a young man were sure to retain the means of a life of ease, pleasure, and self-indulgence, he cannot learn too soon that this is not the way to happiness, — to true and lasting content. Self-indulgence is not self-satisfaction.

The unwary are misled by a term which does not mean what it purports to mean. In point of fact, self-indulgence is not the indulgence of self, understanding thereby a man's whole self, but only of a part of self: it is not the indulgence of his whole nature, but only of part of his nature, and that the lowest; often, also, to the damage, and sometimes to the ruin, of his higher nature. What we call self-indulgence is not indulgence of self, in any proper sense of that word, but rather of this or that low or sordid passion which threatens the degradation and perhaps the ruin of self; and it is probably the secret consciousness of this fact which constitutes that drop of bitterness and self-reproach which is always found at the bottom of the cup of pleasure.

Still, the best antidote to dreaming of a life of ease, pleasure, and self-indulgence is found in a serious and thoughtful glance at its actual results in other men. It is not merely that they wake up at length, and know it to be a dream; for this is no more than what sometimes happens in respect to worthy and generous aspirations; but with a most important difference: in the latter case we do not regret the dream; we feel we are the better for it. On the other hand, there is no weariness and disgust of life like that which gathers over the spirits of a broken-down man of pleasure, who has found out, when too late, that his is that laughter in which the heart is sorrowful, and his that mirth the end of which is heaviness. With no relish for vice, and no confidence in virtue, the best that can be expected from the old age of such a man is a decorous conformity to conventionalities, for which there is left to him neither faith nor heart. One thing, however, he will never do, — and what could better illustrate and enforce my present argument? — under no circumstances whatever will he recommend it to his children to follow in his steps.

I am not inculcating a new doctrine. You are familiar with it as set forth in one of the most impressive apologues for which we are indebted to pagan wisdom: I mean, the Choice of Hercules. It has also been confirmed and consecrated, and adopted into the higher relations of the Christian life, in the account which the gospel gives us of our Lord's Temptation in the Wilderness. Both belong to a large class of exhortations and examples, intended to kindle the imaginations of youth in favor of a life of labor for noble objects, and against a life of indulgence. But if this is right and wise for men in general, it is doubly so for us, — for you. In the old world, and under a widely different political and social constitution, an order of men is found, who are not only raised by birth and position above the necessities of labor, but surrounded by elegant and refined amusements and society, and other objects of interest, to fill up their time and supply the place of regular and serious occupation. By their numbers, and the prestige of rank, they are also able to give a sort of dignity to the life they lead. to make it an object of respect, or, at least, of desire or envy. But here another state of things prevails. It is doubtless premature to speak of what will be in a remote future, but this much is certain: neither our institutions, nor the general condition of the people, have provided as yet for such a class of men. Here, therefore, whoever dreams about a life of elegant leisure will soon find himself to be out of place; with but little to occupy or interest or grace his leisure; with no privileged order to keep him in countenance, indeed almost alone, for if he turns for companionship to others as idle as himself, he will often have to put up with very poor companionship. In short, who does not know that in this country it is hardly considered respectable to be a gentleman, and nothing else?

Not much better is the young man's dream of a life of selfish ambition and worldly success.

The error before described pertains for the most part, as I have intimated, to minds naturally irresolute, and enervated still more by easy and prosperous circumstances ; that of which I am now to speak belongs to persons the very opposite in both character and condition. It belongs to men who are conscious of their strength ; who chafe under the restraints and limitations imposed upon them by what they regard as their hard lot ; who cannot bear to see others, every way their inferiors except in the gifts of fortune, stand higher than they do ; who start, therefore, with a determination to reverse this state of things, come what may. And this tendency is not necessarily lessened — in some respects, indeed, it is stimulated and quickened — in an educated young man. The energies which before were latent have become apparent ; experience and reflection have had the effect to make him more keenly alive to the unequal distribution of external facilities and advantages, and he is apt to say to himself, “ I have not only the abilities, but also the education, necessary to the struggle. I am at the bottom of the ladder now ; but I will be at the top before I die, or die in the attempt.”

Now this is a dream ; here as well as elsewhere. Nothing is more common than to exaggerate, if not entirely to misconceive, the advantages resulting in this respect from our free institutions. Liberty, in the largest and best sense of that word, is, at least in its essential nature, merely a negative, and not a positive, good. It takes off restraints ; it removes obstacles ; it makes it impossible for a single man, or a privileged order of men, to hinder the progress of society or of individuals, against their will. Still it must not be counted on as supplying the place of this progress, or of the knowledge, ability, and effort necessary thereto. Our free institutions do not and cannot work the miracle, or rather the contradiction, of making everybody to be first : there must still be gradations in society ; so that when the boys in a common school are told, as they often are, that any one of them may become President of the United States, the appeal is not only made to a vulgar motive, but the whole is founded on a palpable fallacy. Because the way to the highest distinctions is open to all, it does not follow that the highest distinctions are within the reach of all. In the practical working of the freest institutions of government and society, the great popular advantage is not that the highest distinctions are within the reach of all, but that competency and respectability are within the reach of all. And this should satisfy all. To expect more is to dream.

Nevertheless, I do not condemn it merely because it is a dream : nor yet, because it is a dream of ambition. Ethical writers have raised the question whether ambition is a virtue or a vice ; but simply considered, and strictly speaking, it is neither one nor the other ; not even self-love. Simply considered, it is the desire of power, of the power which mind has over matter, and over other minds, and takes its character of virtue or vice, of selfishness or philanthropy, according to the purpose and spirit by which it is animated. Thus a lawyer, or physician, or clergyman may be ambitious of excellence in his profession, merely with a view to greater usefulness in his profession ; in which case his ambition does but measure the intensity of his desire to do good. Indeed, I cannot see the consistency, and I am slow to believe in the entire sincerity, of those who talk about wishing to do good, and yet fail to manifest, and perhaps affect to disclaim, all wish to enlarge their means of doing good. Look at these men, and then deny, if you can, that much of what passes for aversion to ambition on moral grounds, is but an after-thought to excuse a real and culpable indifference or indolence. Neither the spirit of Christianity, nor the letter of Scripture, forbid ambition, considered merely as a desire to extend the means, and the sphere, of one's influence. We are told, it is true, that "whosoever exalteth himself shall be abased ; and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted." This language, however, as the connection shows, is not intended to rebuke ambition simply considered, but selfish ambition, — anxiety for outward and worldly distinction and success ;— precisely the position I have taken above. To dream of a life of selfish ambition, of outward and worldly distinction and success, is as unwise as it is unchristian ; not, however, as I have said, because it is a dream, for every anticipation of coming life is of the nature of a dream, but because it is a noxious dream.

It is so, in the first place, because a young man, starting under this illusion, is almost sure to forget what constitutes true worth ; which consists in deserving, and not in obtaining, success. Again, it makes success to depend, not upon what he does or can do himself, but upon what others think of what he does ; thus putting it out of his own power, in any proper sense of that word, and looking for it to the uncertain and ever-shifting caprices of the multitude. I am not calling your attention to imaginary evils. Travellers assure us that the faults or defects in the people of this country, by which a foreigner is most struck, are these three : — an unmanly solicitude about what their neighbors will say ; a spirit of unrest, tending to fill the best life with petty annoyances, and taking from the best character the grace of repose ; and, above all, a disposition to estimate every thing, even their abilities and virtues, not according to their real, but according to their marketable, value. And it is in this community, and amidst these tendencies, that your lot is cast. that you are to live and act, with a moral certainty of falling into the national fault, if you begin by committing the national error; if you begin by looking forward to wealth and office, or to leadership in some clique, or in some new movement, as if life had nothing better or safer to promise. Notwithstanding the general, the almost universal, diffusion of the means of material comfort, notwithstanding the boasted and real benefits of popular education, and the actual prevalence of a higher standard of thought and character, it is alleged, and I am afraid with but too much reason, that there is less contentment, less real happiness here, than in most other countries. This does not happen, as some have supposed, because we aim too high, but because we do not aim aright. In laying down our plans of life we dream of incongruous things, of things which are as uncertain and inconstant as the winds, or can only be obtained by means which are destructive of peace and self-respect. Leave these things to others, who are willing to pay the price for them; who are willing to cringe and fawn and crawl. It is enough if you are able to say, and say with truth, "I have not these things because I sought them not, because I desire them not, because I have what is better."

And this leads me to consider dreams of life of another character; which, though dreams, are nevertheless true to our nature and destiny, and do us nothing but good, whether they ever come to pass or not.

First among these I would mention the young man's dream of extensive usefulness, wrought out with unsullied honor, and crowned with a good name.

It is highly creditable to human nature, that, when men begin to dream of what they are to be and do, they almost always picture their future course as a highly beneficent one. Call this castle-building or what you will, no matter whether it ever comes to any thing or not, it proves thus much at least: that the first preferences, the natural leanings of the bulk of mankind, are in favor of what is noble and good. But soon, under the experiences of life, at least in the case of many, a change is apt to come over the spirit of this dream: they begin to distrust it, to be ashamed of it, to turn it into a jest. When this is the result of repeated disappointment, and treachery on the part of others, it is more an occasion of pity than rebuke; but not so when it takes place in consequence of a decay of virtue in the individual himself. In a majority of cases, especially among the young, the change may be traced, I suspect, to the indurating effects which habits of frivolity and guilty pleasure have on the human heart: all the generous aspirations of the soul are swallowed up and lost in "the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life." A multitude of discourses have been written on the bad effects of early dissipation; but the most mournful among them all, because the most radical among them all, is this moral scepticism, this tendency to destroy all interest and all faith in goodness, and in doing good.

There is no reason why any one should despair of being constantly and eminently useful, who has a disposition to be so. It is a vulgar error to suppose that wealth, or station, or genius are necessary; very different has been the condition of most of those whom mankind have hailed as their deliverers and benefactors. Even the Lord of Life took the form of a servant, and chose his disciples from among the humblest classes, though with the promise and clear foresight that he and they should soon sit on thrones, and give laws to the world. To realize the fondest dream of single-hearted, unostentatious beneficence, nothing more is required than to have it always uppermost in your thoughts to do the good thing, or say the good word, which the occasion suggests and invites: - to counsel a friend, when a word or a look may be sufficient to decide the question of his whole life:

to lift up your voice for the weak and the wronged ; to have the courage to be consistent and moderate under the pressure of popular excitements ; and in general to win men through the gentle and quiet influence of a good example. Even professional usefulness would seem to have but little to do with what is commonly understood by professional distinction. Who is the useful clergyman ? Not necessarily he who preaches what are called " great sermons," but he who is looked up to by the young and the old as the father of his flock ; the umpire in all differences ; whose presence in seasons of distress is as that of an angel of mercy ; whose influence is also felt in education, as manifested not only in the schools, but in the taste and manners of the people, and even in their roads and dwellings, so that a stranger cannot drive through the village without being impressed with the evidence that a wise and good man has been there. Nothing, I repeat it, is needed for all this, so far as it depends on man, but the disposition. The only quality of mind for which Oberlin, the Protestant pastor in the Ban de la Roche, can be said to have been distinguished, was an earnest, straightforward purpose to do good ; and the memorial of what he did is immortal.

The eyes of Christians are open, at length, to the full significance of the teachings of the gospel

on this subject. "Whosoever will be great among you, let him be your minister; and whosoever will be chief among you, let him be your servant." Hence the principle of genuine philanthropy was never so active in the community as at this moment. You see it everywhere; in the perilous and self-denying course of the foreign missionary, bearing the blessings of Christian civilization to the most benighted parts of the earth: in the outcry of indignation at the neglected condition of a mercenary soldiery, and in the unprecedented efforts to mitigate their sufferings. You see it also, nearer home, in the thousand forms of that sensitive and restless compassion which extends its regards to the humblest and most abject, — to children in factories, to the poor debtor, to the discharged prisoner, to the maniac pauper, to the squalid misery collected in large cities, — "which pries," as it has been said, "into the stores and water-casks of every emigrant ship, which winces at every lash laid on the back of a drunken sailor, which will not suffer the thief in the hulks to be ill-fed or over-worked." Men are beginning to feel, as they never did before, that there is an important sense in which every one is his brother's keeper. Moreover, this service, which men have been content to regard hitherto as a part of duty, is beginning to be regarded as a part of greatness. The military hero and the intellectual hero have long been worshipped; the claims of the moral hero are beginning to be recognized. A dream, do you call it? But the success, far beyond the most sanguine expectations, which has attended many philanthropic enterprises, and the glory which has crowned it, show that it is a dream which is every day coming to pass. Merely as a dream also it makes a man better and happier, for it raises him above himself; and, even if he falls a martyr to it, how much better to fall here, than on the field of battle; where, as the greatest captain of the age has said, the horrors of a victory are only exceeded by the horrors of a defeat.

One word, in conclusion, on the young man's dream of progress in knowledge and virtue; his dream of self-perfection.

There is a sect of Christians, who derive their name from holding the doctrine that every one can and ought to become morally perfect in the present life. I am disposed to regard this as an idle and a mischievous dream; but it is mischievous from the circumstance that they look upon perfection as an acquisition, and not as an aim; it is a perfection which belongs to here and there one, and not a perfectibility which belongs to all. Let no one reject or dismiss the dream of perfection in the last-mentioned sense, on the ground that it pertains to enthusiasts alone. If there ever was a person not to be classed with enthusiasts, it was Dr. Franklin ; yet he tells us in his autobiography that, when he was a young man, he conceived the arduous project of making himself morally perfect ; and, from the manner in which he insists on the details, it is plain how much importance he attached to the attempt. In its most general signification, this dream of self-perfection simply expresses the fact, that, not being satisfied with the actual, we hold up before us an ideal good. As the artist holds up before him an ideal beauty, which he strives to copy and make his own, so the Christian holds up before him an ideal self, which he strives to realize. A life without these ideals would be stagnation and moral death. And besides, what can be more explicit than the teachings of the New Testament on this point ? “ Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.” “ Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the fulness of Christ.”

This, then, is the application of what I have said, which I would impress on those especially, who are worshipping with us for the last time. You have dreamed of many things, while you have been here. If you have dreamed of a life of ease and pleasure and self-indulgence, or of a life of selfish ambition and worldly success and display, I beseech you to dismiss the thought from this moment. All such dreams are false to your nature and destiny; they are utterly unsuitable and impracticable in this country; and under the most favorable circumstances they can only end in self-dissatisfaction or self-contempt. But you have dreamed of better things than these. You have dreamed of a life of usefulness, and of a just and honorable fame. Even in the midst of levities and indiscretions, which have filled the hearts of those who love you with inexpressible concern, you have yet dreamed of a future career that would satisfy the best expectations of your friends, reflect honor on the place of your education, and help to uphold the institutions and liberties of our common country. Some of you have marked out for yourselves a line of conduct which will lead to eminence in business or in the secular professions; some of you propose to devote yourselves more exclusively to scientific pursuits, in the hope, and with the purpose, to extend the bounds of human knowledge for human good; some of you have made up your minds to give yourselves, more immediately and more entirely, to the great ministry of humanity, and to the Church of the Living God. Reverence these dreams of your youth. Make your future lives the fulfilment of these dreams. Remember, you are not to live for the past, for that is gone ; nor for the present, for while I am yet speaking that is also gone : but for the future, which is all before you. And, if faithful, you have the promise of help and of victory, from that mysterious and awful and all-sustaining Presence in which you will act and live.

MORAL DISTINCTIONS NOT SUFFICIENTLY RE-GARDED IN SOCIAL INTERCOURSE.

“He that walketh with wise men shall be wise; but a companion of fools shall be destroyed.” — PROVERBS xiii. 20.

THAT “a man may be known by the company he keeps,” has passed into a proverb among all nations, — thus attesting what has been the universal experience. The fact would seem to be that a man’s associates either find him, or make him, like themselves. An acute but severe critic of manners, who was too often led by his disposition and circumstances to sink the philosopher in the satirist, has said, “Nothing is so contagious as example. Never was there any considerable good or ill action, that hath not produced its like. We imitate good ones through emulation; and bad ones through that malignity in our nature, which shame conceals, and example sets at liberty.”

This being the case, or any thing like it, all, I think, must agree that moral distinctions are not sufficiently cared for in social intercourse. In forming our intimacies we are sometimes determined by the mere accident of being thrown together; sometimes by a view to connections and social position; sometimes by the fascination of what are called companionable qualities: seldom, I fear, by thoughtful and serious regard to the influence they are likely to have on character. We forget that other attractions, of whatsoever nature, instead of compensating for moral unfitness in a companion, only have the effect to make such unfitness the more to be dreaded.

Let me introduce what I have to say on the importance of paying more regard to moral distinctions in the choice of friends, by a few remarks on what are called, by way of distinction, companionable qualities, and on the early manifestation of a free, sociable, confiding turn of mind. Most parents hail the latter, I believe, as the best of prognostics; and in some respects, perhaps, it is. It certainly makes the child more interesting as a child, and more easily governed; it often passes for precocity of talent; at any rate, men are willing to construe it into evidence of the facility with which he will make his way in the world. The father is proud of such a son; the mother idolizes him. If from any cause he is brought into comparison with a reserved, awkward, and unyielding boy in the neighborhood, they are ready enough to felicitate themselves, and others are ready enough to congratulate them, on the difference. And yet I believe I keep within bounds when I say, that, of the two, there is more than an even chance that the reserved, awkward, and unyielding boy, as he grows up, will give his parents less occasion for anxiety and mortification, and become in the end the wiser and better man. The reason is, that, if a child from natural facility of disposition is easily won over to good courses, he is also, from the same cause, liable at any time to be easily seduced from these good courses into bad ones. On the contrary, where a child, from rigor or stubbornness of temper, is peculiarly hard to subdue and manage, there is this hope for a compensation: if by early training, or the experience of life, or a wise foresight of consequences, he is once set right, he is almost sure to keep so.

It is not enough considered, that, in the present constitution of society, men are not in so much danger from want of good dispositions, as from want of firmness and steadiness of purpose. Hence it is that gentle and affectionate minds, more perhaps than any others, stand in need of solid principle and fixed habits of virtue and piety, as a safeguard against the lures and fascinations of the world. A man of a cold, hard, and ungenial nature is comparatively safe so far as the temptations of society go : partly because of this very impracticableness of his nature ; and partly because his companionship is not likely to be desired or sought even by the bad : he will be left to himself. The corrupters of innocence in social intercourse single out for their prey men of companionable qualities. Through his companionable qualities the victim is approached ; and by his companionable qualities he is betrayed.

Let me not be misunderstood. Companionable qualities are not objected to as such. When they spring from genuine goodness of heart, and are the ornament of an upright life, they are as respectable as they are amiable ; and it would be well if Christians and all good men cultivated them more than they do. If we would make virtue and religion to be loved, we must make ourselves to be loved for our virtue and religion ; which would be done if we were faithful to carry the gentleness and charity of the gospel into our manners as well as into our morals. Nevertheless, we insist that companionable qualities, when they have no better source than a sociable disposition, or, worse still, an easy temper and loose principles, are full of danger to their possessor, and full of danger to the community ; especially where, from any cause, but little regard is paid to moral distinctions in social intercourse. We also say, that in such a state of society the danger will be most imminent to those whom we should naturally be most anxious to save, — I mean, persons of a loving and yielding turn of mind.

And this brings me back again to the position taken in the beginning of this discourse. The reason why companionable qualities are attended with so much danger is, that society itself is attended with so much danger ; and the reason why society itself is attended with so much danger is, that social intercourse is not more under the control of moral principles, moral rules, and moral sanctions.

My argument does not make it necessary to exaggerate the evils and dangers of modern society. I am willing to suppose that there have been times when society was much less pure than it is now ; and again, that there are places where it is much less pure than it is here : but it does not follow that there are no evils or dangers now and here. On the contrary, it is easy to see that there may be stages in the progressive improvement of society, where the improvement itself will have the effect, not to lessen, but to increase the danger, so far as good men are concerned. In a community where vice abounds, where the public manners are notoriously and grossly corrupt, good men are put on their guard. Good men will not be injured by such society, for they will have nothing to do with it. A broad line of demarcation is drawn between what is expected from good men, and what is expected from bad men ; so that the example of the latter has no effect on the former except to admonish and to warn. But let the work of refinement and reform go on in general society until vice itself is constrained to wear a decent exterior, until an air of decorum and respectability is thrown over all public meetings and amusements, and one consequence will be that the distinction between Christians and the world will not be so clearly seen, or so carefully observed, as before. The standard of the world, from the very fact that it is brought nearer to the standard of the gospel, will be more frequently confounded with it ; Christians will feel at liberty to do whatever the world does, and the danger is, that they will come at length to do it from the same principles.

Besides, are we sure that we have not formed too favorable an opinion of the moral condition of general society, — of that general society in the midst of which we are now living, and to the influence of which we are daily and hourly exposed ? We should remember that, in pronouncing on the character of public opinion and public sentiment, we are very likely to be affected and determined ourselves, not a little, by the fact that we share in that very public opinion and public sentiment which we are called upon to judge. I have no doubt that virtue, in general, is esteemed even by the world, or that, other things being equal, a man of integrity will be preferred on account of his integrity. But this is not enough. It shows that the multitude see, and are willing to acknowledge, the dignity and worth of an upright course; but it does not prove them to have that abhorrence for sin, which it is the purpose and the tendency of the gospel to plant in all minds. If they had this settled and rooted abhorrence for sin, which marks the Christian, and without which a man cannot be a Christian, they would not only prefer virtue to vice, "other things being equal," but they would do so whether other things were equal or not; they would knowingly keep no terms with vice, however recommended or glossed over by interest or worldly favor, or refined and elegant manners.

Now I ask whether general society, even as it exists amongst us, will bear this test? Is it not incontestable that very unscrupulous and very dangerous men, if they happen to be men of talents, or men of fashion, or men of peculiarly engaging manners, find but little difficulty in insinuating themselves into what is called good society; nay, are often among those who are most courted and caressed? Some vices, I know, are understood to put one under the social ban; but it is because they offend, not merely against morality and religion, but against taste, against good-breeding, against certain conventions of the world. To be convinced of this it is only necessary to observe that the same, or even a much larger amount of acknowledged criminality, manifested under other forms, is not found to be attended with the same result. The mischiefs of this state of things are felt by all; but especially by those who are growing up in what are generally accounted the most favored walks of life. On entering into society they see men of known profligacy mingling in the best circles, and with the best people, if not indeed on terms of entire sympathy and confidence, at least on those of the utmost possible outward respect and courtesy. They see all this, and they see it every day; and it is by such flagrant inconsistencies in those they look up to for guidance, more perhaps than by any other one cause, that their own principles and their own faith are undermined. And besides, being thus encouraged and countenanced in associating with dissipated and profligate men in what is called good society, they will be apt to construe it into liberty to associate with them anywhere. At any rate the intimacy is begun. As society is constituted at present, corrupting intimacies are not infrequently begun amidst all the decencies of life, and, it may be, in the presence and under the countenance and sanction of parents and virtuous friends, which are afterwards renewed and consummated, and this too by an easy, natural, and almost necessary gradation, amidst scenes of excess,—perhaps in the haunts of ignominy and crime.

If one should propose a reform in this respect, I am aware of the difficulties and objections that would stand in his way.

Some would affirm it to be impracticable in the nature of things. They would reason thus:—“The circle in which a man visits and moves is made for him, and not by him; at any rate, it is not, and cannot be, determined by moral considerations alone. Something depends on education; something on family connections or mere vicinity; something on similarity in tastes and pursuits; something also on equality or approximation in wealth and standing. A poor man, or a man having a bare competency, if he is as virtuous and industrious, is just as respectable as a rich man; but it is plain that he cannot afford to pitch his style of living, or his style of hospitality, on the same scale of expense. It is better for both, therefore, that they should visit in different circles." Perhaps it is; but what then? I am not recommending an amalgamation of the different classes in society. I suppose that such an amalgamation would neither be practicable nor desirable in the existing state of things. All I contend for is, that in every class, open and gross immorality of any kind should exclude a man from reputable company. Will any one say that this is impracticable? Let a man, through untoward events, but not by any fault or neglect of his own, be reduced in his circumstances, — let a man become generally odious, not in consequence of any immorality, but because, perhaps, he has embraced the unpopular side in politics or religion, — let a man omit some trifling formality which is construed into a vulgarity, or a personal affront, — and people do not appear to find much difficulty in dropping the acquaintance. If, then, it is so easy a thing to drop a man's acquaintance for other reasons, and for no reason, — from mere prejudice, from mere caprice, — will it still be pretended that it cannot be done at the command of duty and religion?

Again, it may be objected that, if you banish a man from general society for his immoralities, you will drive him to despair, and so destroy the only remaining hope of his reformation. What! are you going to keep society corrupt in the vain expectation that a corrupt state of society will help to reform its corrupt members? Besides, I grant that we should have compassion on the guilty; but I also hold that we should have compassion on the innocent, too. Would you, therefore, allow a bad man to continue in good society, when the chances are a thousand to one that he will make others as bad as himself, and not more than one to a thousand that he himself will be reclaimed? Moreover, this reasoning is fallacious throughout. By expelling a dissipated and profligate man from good society, instead of destroying all hope of his recovery, you do in fact resort to the only remaining means of reforming one over whom a fear of God, and a sense of character, and the upbraidings of conscience have lost their power. What cares he for principle, or God, or an hereafter? Nothing, therefore, is so likely to encourage and embolden him to go on in his guilty course, as the belief that he will be allowed to do so without the forfeiture of the only thing he does care for, his reputable standing in the world. On the other hand, nothing is so likely to arrest him in these courses, and bring him to serious reflection, as the stern and determined threat of absolute exclusion from good society, if he persists.

Another objection will also be made which has stronger claims on our sympathy and respect. We shall be told that the innocent as well as the guilty will suffer, — the guilty man's friends and connections, who will probably feel the indignity more than he does himself. God forbid that we should needlessly add to the pain of those who are thus connected! But we must remember that the highest form of friendship does not consist in blindly falling in with the feelings of those whom we would serve, but in consulting what will be for their real and permanent good. If, therefore, the course here recommended has been shown to be not only indispensable to public morals, but more likely than any other to reclaim the offender, it is clearly not more a dictate of justice to the community, than of Christian charity to the parties more immediately concerned. Consider, also, how much is asked, when a good man is called upon to open his doors to persons without virtue and without principle. Unless the social circle is presided over by a spirit which will rebuke and frown away immorality, whatever fashionable names and disguises it may wear, — unless your sons and daughters can meet together without being in danger of having their faith disturbed by the jeers of the infidel, or their purity sullied by the breath of the libertine, neither they nor you are safe in the most innocent enjoyments and recreations. Parents at least should take a deep interest in this subject, if they do not wish to see the virtue, which they have reared under the best domestic discipline, blighted and corrupted before their eyes by the temptations to which their children are almost necessarily exposed in general society,—a society which they cannot escape except by going out of the world, and which they cannot partake of without endangering the loss of what is of more value than a thousand worlds.

I have failed altogether in my purpose in this discourse if I have not done something to increase your distrust of mere companionable qualities, when not under the control of moral and religious principle; and also of the moral character and moral influence of general society, as at present constituted. Still you may ask, “If I associate with persons worse than myself, how can it be made out to be more probable that they will drag me down to their level, than that I shall lift them up to mine?” The answer to this question, I hardly need say, depends, in no small measure, on the reason or motive which induces the association. If you mix with the world, not for purposes of pleasure or self-advantage,—if you resort to society, not for society as an end, but as a means to a higher end, the improvement of society itself,—you do but take up the heavenly mission which Christ began. For not being able to make this distinction, through the hollowness and corruption of their own hearts, the Pharisees thought it to be a just ground of accusation against our Lord, that he was willing to be accounted the friend of publicans and sinners. Let the same mind be in you that was also in Christ Jesus, and we cannot doubt that the spirit which inspires you will preserve you wherever you may go. It is of such persons that our Lord has said: "Behold, I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions, and over all the power of the enemy; and nothing shall by any means harm you." Very far am I, therefore, from denying that we may do good in society, as well as incur danger and evil. Even in common friendships frequent occasions will present themselves for mutual service, for mutual counsel and admonition. Let me impress upon you this duty. Perhaps there is not one among you all, who has not at this moment companions on whom he can confer an infinite blessing. If there is a weak place in their characters, if to your knowledge they are contemplating a guilty purpose, if they are on the brink of entering into dangerous connections, by a timely, affectionate, and earnest remonstrance you may save them from ruin. Remember, we shall all be held responsible, not only for the evil which we do ourselves, but for the evil which we might prevent others from doing: it is not enough that we stand; we must endeavor to hold up our friends.

Very different from this, however, is the ordinary commerce of society; and hence its danger. If we mix with the world for the pleasure it affords, we shall be likely to be among the first to be reconciled to the freedom and laxity it allows. The world is not brought up to us, but we sink down to the world; the drop becomes of the consistence and color of the ocean into which it falls; the ocean itself remains unchanged. In the words of an old writer, "Though the well-disposed will remain some good space without corruption, yet time, I know not how, worketh a wound in him. Which weakness of ours considered, and easiness of nature, apt to be deceived, looked into, they do best provide for themselves that separate themselves as far as they can from the bad, and draw as nigh to the good, as by any possibility they can attain to." "He that walketh with wise men shall be wise; but a companion of fools shall be destroyed."

ST THOMAS, OR THE DOUBTING DISCIPLE.

“But Thomas, one of the Twelve, called Didymus, was not with them when Jesus came. The other disciples said unto him, We have seen the Lord. But he said unto them, Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe.” — JOHN XX. 24, 25.

IT is a singular fact that the company of the Apostles, though but twelve in number, comprised almost every possible variety of mind and temper. There were the contemplative and affectionate John, the vehement Peter, the guileless and confiding Nathaniel, the judicious James, the selfish and plotting Judas, the sceptical Thomas. And I cannot bring myself to believe that this was accidental, or that it was without a particular design in the overruling providence of God. Certain it is, that, for us who must believe in the leading facts of Christianity on historical testimony, the circumstance here referred to has given a peculiar weight to that testimony. It shows that the evidence for these facts to eye-witnesses was of such a nature as to produce conviction, not merely in one sort of minds, but in all sorts of minds, and among the rest, in minds constitutionally distrustful and incredulous.

Under this point of view, let our attention now be called to the conduct and character of Thomas, who, though "one of the Twelve," had a mind so slow to accept the supernatural, that he could say when told of our Lord's resurrection, "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe."

Let us begin by glancing at what had been previously said of this Apostle by the sacred writers, considered as defining his position and illustrating his character.

He is introduced to us in the first instance, when Jesus was on the eve of suddenly returning to Judea, that he might raise Lazarus from the dead. Jesus had just left that country, retiring with the Twelve into Peræa on the other side of Jordan, which was beyond the jurisdiction of the High Priest and his Council at Jerusalem; and this he had done partly at least that he might escape out of their hands, for they were now bent on his destruction. On his announcing unexpectedly his determination to go back, his disciples remonstrated with one voice, for the impression of the blind fury with which the ruling party among the Jews were actuated against him was still fresh in their minds. They protested, therefore, against the temerity of putting himself so soon into their power again; but when they found it was to no avail, Thomas turned round, and said to his fellow-disciples, "Let us also go that we may die with him."

Here certainly there was no want of affection, fidelity, or self-devotion; but the action of these fine qualities was mingled with gloomy forebodings which had their spring in a nature prone to doubt and despondency. In moral principle and generous feeling, Thomas does not seem to have fallen below the other Apostles; his infirmity consisted in a constitutional tendency to distrust, which tempted him to look at the dark side of things. He did not doubt the reality or the obligation of virtue; what he doubted was the promises made to it, at least as regards this life. He was not a sceptic in respect to principles, but only in respect to promises. Accordingly, conscience and kind affection never forsook him, though hope did. In the particular case under consideration, he had no intention of deserting his Master, come what would. He felt, he knew, that Master to be worthy of any sacrifices on his part he could be called upon to make, even though they should involve the sacrifice of his life. He was ready to die with him or for him. Finding it impossible, therefore, to dissuade our Lord from the rash enterprise, as his Apostles regarded it, on which he was bent, Thomas was the foremost to say, "Then let us follow him; let us stand by him to the last; let no one entertain the thought of abandoning him now." These certainly were utterances of love and duty, and not the less so because half in despair.

The same spirit is also evinced by this apostle on his next appearance in the evangelical narrative. The Supper of the Passover, the last which our Lord took with his disciples, was over; the Traitor had just left them in order to keep his appointment with a party whom the High Priest had sent to arrest Jesus; and Jesus himself, though darkly and as it were by degrees, as they were able to bear it, had announced his approaching departure. Meanwhile, the whole company had become exceedingly sorrowful and depressed by the turn which the conversation had taken, and the gloomy but indistinct apprehensions it had awakened in their minds; and it was with a view to alleviate, as far as might be, this despondency, that Jesus began to speak of the benefits to accrue to them and others from his going away. "In my Father's house are many mansions: if it were not so, I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I will come again and receive you to myself; that where I am, there ye may be also. And whither I go ye know, and the way ye know." And so, it would seem, they might; but a veil was on their hearts, through the Jewish prejudice respecting the earthly kingdom of the Messiah, which hindered them from understanding these words to refer to his death, to his passing into another world. Thomas especially, — who was, as we have seen, naturally slow, cautious, and distrustful, depending much on the evidence of the senses, and finding but small encouragement in vague prospects of good, and who, in this particular instance, like Peter before him, appears to have understood Jesus as alluding to some temporary place of concealment to which he was about to retire from his pursuers. — breaks out into an expression of something like impatience: "Lord, we know not where you are going; how then can we know the way?"

Here again, however, there is no want of affection or fidelity. On the contrary, it is this very affection and fidelity which is at the bottom of his uneasiness and dissatisfaction. It is not his indifference, but his love for Jesus, which makes him impatient of the obscurity in which the latter had wrapped his thoughts and his plans. He is solicitous to know and see with his own eyes the retreat concluded on, and the way to it, that he and the rest of the disciples might judge of its security; and this, too, not so much on his own account as on that of his revered Master. Whatever else he suspects, he never, you will observe, suspects Jesus himself; he never distrusts him; he never betrays, in the slightest degree, a want of confidence in the entire truthfulness and rectitude of our Lord: which is the more remarkable, as that, from the sceptical turn of his mind, was almost the only thing in which he was disposed to trust.

The third and only other occasion, on which Thomas comes forth prominently into notice in the gospels, is in connection with the evidences of our Lord's resurrection.

Notwithstanding all our Lord had said and done to prepare the Twelve for his violent and ignominious death, it is evident that this event took them by surprise, disconcerted all their cherished hopes, and led them to give up all for lost. It was not that they could remember any thing in his life, any thing which had transpired in their long and familiar intercourse with him, that should abate their confidence in his truth and sincerity, or in the reality of his many wonderful qualities and mighty works ; but the single fact that he had been arrested, and given over to die an ignominious death, was utterly irreconcilable with their preconceived notions of THE MESSIAH. For this reason, and for this reason alone, they thought it could not be “ He who was to restore Israel,” and therefore that they must “ look for another.” Accordingly, having come to the conclusion that now nothing more was to be done for the common cause, each one’s fears prompted him to consult his own safety, and the little band broke up and fled. Still, however, they lingered about in Jerusalem and the neighboring villages ; and after the Crucifixion, and especially after the third day had come, a common interest, a common danger, a common affection, — coöperating, perhaps, with faint hopes that their Master might rise from the dead, founded on ill-understood intimations dropped by him while living, and still further quickened by vague rumors in circulation that he had appeared to the women at the sepulchre, — drew many of them together again. And, while they were together, Jesus came and stood in the midst of them, convincing them, by indubitable signs addressed to their senses, of the reality of his presence and the identity of his person.

Thomas, however, was not at this meeting, his constitutional slowness and distrust making him to be among the last to rally. And when at last he came, and was told by the others that they had seen the Lord, the same sceptical turn of mind made him refuse to give credit to what they said. He could not believe it; it was too good to be true; they had been too ready and too easy in their faith; they had not applied sufficiently severe tests; their wishes and their excited imaginations had played into the hands of the illusion; at best, it must have been a phantasm, a mere apparition: at any rate, he should so regard it, until with his own eyes he should see the prints of the nails, and with his own fingers touch the wounds in the hands and the side.

Let us not be hasty in execrating or blaming an incredulity, which, under the providence of God, has been made to answer a wise and beneficent end; which does not necessarily involve guilt, and was met, moreover, with so much kindness and forbearance by our Lord himself. Those who are for making no distinction among sceptics would do well to remember, that there are three distinct and independent sources of doubt or unbelief, each of which stamps it with a different and peculiar character.

In the first place, there is the doubt or unbelief which springs from moral unfitness or prejudice. By this I mean the difficulty a bad or unspiritual man finds in appreciating or accepting the revelations of the gospel, merely because he is a bad or unspiritual man. This difficulty arises partly from the essential unwelcomeness of these revelations to such a person, and partly from their not finding any response in a selfish, worldly, or corrupt heart. This is the class of whom the Scriptures speak as being "slow of heart to believe;" where there is no living sympathy with spiritual truth, there can be no living faith in spiritual truth. Moreover, I would not have you understand that what is here said of bad or unspiritual men applies to those only who have been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors, or who are of vicious and depraved character in the estimation of the world. It implies, indeed, to a certain extent, a deadness or perversion of the moral sensibilities; this, however, may be owing, not to our love of evil, but to our want of the love of good, — to our want of faith and high aspiration and self-devotion. No heart is more inaccessible to religious impressions than that of your cool, prudent, self-possessed man of the world, who looks upon gross vice as a mistake, upon virtue as an amiable enthusiasm, and upon heaven as a dream.

This sort of scepticism, all will admit, argues great and serious moral defects, and is highly culpable; but there is no reason to suspect that the scepticism of Thomas resembled it, either in its origin or its results.

Another source of scepticism is to be found in the disgusts occasioned by the errors and corruptions which have been mixed up with Christianity, and by the inconsistencies of nominal Christians. Here again there is doubtless ground for blame; but much the largest portion of it should fall on those who cause these disgusts. Nothing is easier than to say, that Christianity ought to be judged by what it is in itself; above all, that it never should be made responsible for the misconduct of men who say that they are Christians, but are not. Nobody doubts that these are very proper discriminations; but we must not expect that all well-disposed persons will make them. Do what we may, say what we may, actual Christianity will pass with most persons for real Christianity, and the inconsistencies of nominal Christians will be charged upon the bad, or at best upon the imperfect, working of the whole system. This being the case, when men read the history of what is called THE CHURCH, and see what absurdities have been taught, and what abominations have been committed under the abused name of Christianity, who can wonder that the faith of not a few has been more or less disturbed; in other words, that their disgusts have so often refused to stop where undoubtedly they ought to stop? I am disposed to regard this as a common source of doubt ; and the more so in proportion as an inquisitive and critical spirit prevails. I go further. When this doubt is unaccompanied by irreverence or moral indifference, nay, when it springs, as it sometimes does, from an instinctive repugnance to admit any thing as coming from God which derogates from His perfections, or sits like an incubus on the reason and liberties of man, I cannot help thinking that it is to a certain extent excusable. At any rate, the most guilty ones are those who have occasioned the scandal ; not those who are misled by it. Be this, however, as it may, it is obvious that the scepticism here described is not that which troubled the apostle.

I pass, therefore, to the consideration of a third species of incredulity, having its source in organization, or in some radical differences of the mental constitution. While the multitude love the marvellous and are easily carried away by it, even to the adoption of the wildest and most absurd vagaries, it is not to be denied that individuals are occasionally to be met with in the world, all whose tendencies are to the opposite extreme, — individuals who can hardly bring themselves, on any evidence short of mathematical or ocular demonstration, to credit statements involving the extraordinary or the supernatural. Such scepticism, as all must perceive, is strictly speaking a natural and not a moral defect : — a misfortune, doubtless, and one which often exerts a baneful influence on the character, but, in itself considered, in no sense a crime. If, indeed, we yield to this natural bias further or more easily than our own reason and conscience approve ; above all, if we nourish it, and pride ourselves upon it, as a sign of mental superiority, in that case we make it our own, and must answer for it as we best can. On the other hand, if we watch against the bias in question, as we would against any other natural infirmity, or constitutional temptation, — if the doubting disciple is a disciple still, sincere and humble, — in other words, if we doubt only that we may believe, and question only that we may make the foundations of our faith more sure, it is certain that a naturally sceptical turn of mind will have no other effect than to afford us a better opportunity for the display of our love of the truth.

Those who are for showing no mercy to involuntary sceptics of this description would do well to consider how differently they were treated by the Lord himself. At the first manifestation of Jesus to his assembled followers after his resurrection, Thomas, as we have said, was not present. Eight days afterwards they were together again, Thomas being with them ; and Jesus stood in the midst and said, "Peace be unto you." "Then saith he to Thomas, reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side; and be not faithless but believing. And Thomas answered and said unto him, My Lord and my God!"

Here was no denunciation, no upbraiding of the incredulity of the affectionate and honest, but doubting, disciple; on the contrary, an earnest solicitude to overcome that incredulity by evidence suited to his cast of mind. And the appeal resulted in complete success, as his exclamation of astonishment and recognition sufficiently shows.

Some persons are so taken up with remote doctrinal inferences from this exclamation of Thomas, as hardly to notice its more direct and immediate bearings. Perhaps it is not to be wondered at, that those who find evidence in other parts of Scripture to convince them that Christ is God, in the absolute sense of that word, should also think to see here the traces of that belief. Even they, however, must be aware how dangerous it must be to lay much stress on mere words, or turns of expression extorted by circumstances so exciting, so peculiar, so unexpected, so astounding. Suppose a friend, whose funeral we attended three days ago, should stand before us now. Who can tell precisely in what terms he would utter his sense of the fact, coupled with the bewilderment of his faculties as to how it could be? One thing is sufficiently obvious: it would be likely to be, as it was with Thomas, in the form of a religious exclamation; and ought perhaps to be interpreted, in both cases, as being little else than a religious exclamation, — an expression of feeling and not of thought. In the case of Thomas it signified, to be sure, that he no longer had any doubts about the question at issue; but the question at issue in his mind was the fact of the resurrection, and had nothing to do with any of the modern theories for or against the Divine nature of Christ. Very probably the question of the resurrection was mixed up in the mind of Thomas with that of the Messiahship, so that one suggested and involved the other. The resurrection proved Jesus to be the Messiah; but certainly it did not prove him to be God; on the contrary, it assumed that he had been dead. What Jew could have been made to believe, or even to entertain the conception, that Jehovah, the only Being whom he acknowledged as God in the absolute sense of that word, had just risen from the dead? If therefore in the exclamation, “My Lord and my God,” we must understand Thomas as meaning to apply both appellatives to the risen Jesus, we must still presume that the latter is to be taken in a secondary or figurative sense, according to a common use of it in his day, which consisted in calling "them Gods, unto whom the word of God came."

The instructive lesson to be gathered from this apostle's renunciation of his doubts is not doctrinal, but practical. It intimates, in the first place, that if the sceptic's love of truth does not fail him, he is almost sure to attain at last to the truth itself; and secondly, that the only way in which he can be saved from the evil, and it may be the sin, of doubt, is by being converted from the doubt.

There are sceptics, I believe, who think to find excuse for their scepticism, though persisted in, on the ground that "one of the Twelve" was a sceptic like themselves. And so he was for a time; but if his scepticism had not yielded to the evidence, — in other words, if he had continued faithless and unbelieving, Judas Iscariot was not more certain to be ejected from his apostleship than he. Those who think themselves innocent and safe, because they begin as the apostle did, must take care that they also end as the apostle did. In one word, if they are like him in a constitutional difficulty and slowness of belief, and in honest hesitation, they must also take care to be like him in not allowing these habits to engender indifference, or to make them less open to conviction, or less disposed to accept the proof when it comes.

Will it then be said, that the proof which came to Thomas does not and cannot come to us? Will the sceptics of the nineteenth century urge: "If ocular demonstration were vouchsafed to us, it would instantly disperse our doubts. We also should be glad to believe. Let the same appeal be made to us that was made to Thomas, 'Reach hither thy finger and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand and thrust it into my side; and be not faithless but believing,' — and we should doubtless do as he did. So that after all, taking the Scriptures as authority, we are just like the apostle; except that Providence does not interfere in our behalf, as it did in his. In our circumstances, Thomas would have persisted in his scepticism as we persist in our scepticism."

Granting for a moment that it were so, — granting also that persistence in scepticism, under the circumstances here supposed, is not a fault, it by no means follows that it is not an evil, and a great evil. Moreover, there are evils which, though not entering themselves into moral character, affect moral character nevertheless most seriously; and want of faith, even if nothing but an evil in itself considered, is certainly an evil of this description. Want of faith, religious scepticism, by whatsoever cause induced, no matter whether a sin or a mere misfortune, must have the effect to unsettle our confidence in the highest motives to duty of every kind, and in all motives to duty of the highest kind, turning our best and most distinctive aspirations, as immortal beings and the children of God, into a passing and mocking dream.

But is it true that scepticism is any more reasonable or excusable now than formerly? Of course we cannot seriously insist on being eye-witnesses of what took place twenty centuries ago. It is enough to know that there were eye-witnesses, and that they were convinced; nay, more, that the most sceptical man now alive had a representative there, in the person of "one of the Twelve," and he was convinced. What satisfied one sceptical man we may reasonably presume would have satisfied any sceptical man; and here the question obviously is, not whether you or I were actually present, but whether, if we had been present, we should probably have been satisfied.

And besides, if contemporaries had a kind of evidence which is denied to us, we also, on our part, have a kind of evidence which was denied to them. "Refrain from these men," said Gamaliel, "and let them alone: for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought; but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God." Now, "this counsel or this work" has stood. Nay, more, it has not only become the accepted religion of the whole civilized world, but modern civilization is built upon it. We have, therefore, a proof of its Divine origin, which the most enlightened Jew of apostolic times regarded as more decisive than any to be had by contemporaries and eye-witnesses.

Nor is this all. Every truth which appeals to the sentiments as well as the understanding — as in the case of taste, morals, or religion — must depend more or less for its reception on the fact that the minds to whom it is addressed have been educated up to it. The sentiments appealed to must be already developed, at least to some degree, or those who make the appeal will “speak into the air.” An unspiritual man must believe in spiritual truths, if he believes in them at all, on authority alone; but the spiritual man has a witness in himself. Hence our Lord’s reply to his once doubting, but now believing disciple: “Thomas, because thou hast seen me thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen and yet have believed.” A passage not unlike this is found in one of the Jews’ books. “A proselyte,” we are there told, “is more beloved of the Holy Blessed God than all the Israelites before Mount Sinai; for they saw and heard the thunderings, flames, and lightnings; but the proselyte has not seen this, yet, devoting himself to God, hath taken upon him the kingdom of heaven." The meaning is, that the best men hardly require outward evidence of any kind to convince them of spiritual realities. They find the witness in themselves, — in that spiritual tact, in that inward sense of heavenly and divine things, which constitutes the essence of a living and saving faith.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

'And seeing the multitudes, he went up into a mountain; and when he was set, his disciples came unto him: and he opened his mouth and taught them.' — MATTHEW v. 1, 2.

AT the age of thirty, our Lord entered on his public ministry, and was baptized by John. Then followed his Temptation in the Wilderness, — a mysterious experience, which perhaps is best explained by supposing it to have been the temptation attendant on a new consciousness of power. It was suggested to him that he could take this power and turn it to selfish purposes, supplying his physical wants, and acquiring distinction, wealth, and fame. But the temptation had no effect upon him; it did not even so much as sully the purity of his thoughts; though “in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin.” After that, he proceeded to collect around him a chosen and small band of disciples, to be near his person continually, listening to his conversation, asking him questions, and beholding his mighty deeds; that they, at some future day, might be in a condition to take up the same great work when he should be called to lay it down.

He was now in Galilee, in the neighborhood of Capernaum. Multitudes had begun to flock to him from all parts of the country, some attracted by the fame of his wisdom and his miracles, others by a natural curiosity to see with their own eyes and hear with their own ears a man about whom there were so many questions and so much mystery. Up to this time, he seems to have done but little towards declaring himself, — nothing certainly which amounted to what is commonly understood by defining one's position. He felt that to delay doing this any longer would be hardly consistent with openness and fairness of conduct; his followers, before they went any further, ought to know what they had to expect from him, and what he expected from them in return. Full of this idea, he repaired to an elevated spot in the vicinity, from which to address his disciples and the multitude; and, when these had come and arranged themselves around him, he opened his mouth and taught them, pronouncing the longest, and in my judgment, beyond question, the most important and significant, of all his discourses, — the Sermon on the Mount.

I now propose to call your attention to this discourse under a single point of view, that of its being the original and first proclamation of the distinctive peculiarities of Christianity,—a formal statement by our Lord himself of what would be required in the citizens of the new kingdom he had come to set up,—the platform, so to speak, the programme of the new movement.

Restricting myself to this large and general view of the subject, it will not be necessary to take up minor criticisms; but there is one which deserves a passing notice, as it goes to the extent of questioning whether any such proclamation was ever made; whether, in short, the Sermon on the Mount was ever delivered,—that is to say, as we find it in Matthew. Every thoughtful reader of the New Testament must have observed that there is a report in Luke of apparently the same discourse, though in a mutilated form, and with considerable additions and variations; and furthermore, that there are disjointed fragments of this discourse occurring from time to time in both Luke and Mark, apparently as if suggested by passing events. To reconcile and explain these facts, two theories have been advanced. One is, that the discourse was really delivered as given by Matthew, what we find of it in the other Evangelists being of the nature of imperfect sketches, or mere repetitions. The other is, that Matthew, in order that the force and consistency of our Lord's teachings might be more felt, has brought together what he said on various occasions, and given it as one continuous and connected discourse. The first mentioned of these theories is to me the most probable and satisfactory; either, however, may be adopted without essentially affecting my argument. In one case, we have our Lord laying down in the beginning what his followers must be in order to enter into the kingdom of heaven; in the other, we have in one place a collection and summary of all our Lord's teachings on the subject, inculcating, however, the self-same doctrine.

There is also another objection to the use I am going to make of the Sermon on the Mount, which it will be proper to consider for a moment in the outset. It is said, that, to ascertain what constitutes the essence of Christianity, we must resort, not to the first statements of it, but to the last, on the ground that every system is a gradual development from small and imperfectly understood beginnings. Now, in replying to this, I would not be thought to exclude the great law of development, even from Christianity. Undoubtedly it has its place there, but not, as I suppose all will agree, without some distinctions and qualifications. For instance, I suppose it will hardly be pretended by any believer in Christ as a Teacher come from God, that he did not know what constitutes a Christian in the beginning, as well as at any subsequent period. The development, therefore, did not consist so much in his teachings as he understood them, as in the capacity of his disciples to understand him. It did not have the effect to supersede the Sermon on the Mount, but only to enable his followers to enter more entirely into its profound significance. Again, by development, in this connection, is not meant the transforming of one idea into another essentially different, but only that the essential contents of the primitive idea are more fully unfolded and carried out. Accordingly, if the strictly moral and spiritual basis assigned to Christianity in the Sermon on the Mount is made to give place to a doctrinal or ecclesiastic basis, we affirm that this is not development; it is change, substitution, contradiction. Christianity begins by being one thing, and ends by being another. Furthermore, when our Lord said, "I have yet many things to say unto you, but ye cannot bear them now," I do not suppose he intended that the time would come when it would be necessary for men to take an entirely different view of what constitutes the central idea, the essential nature, of the Gospel.

What he meant was simply this: that there were connections, applications, and extensions of the great doctrine of Christian holiness, which they from their Jewish prejudices, and especially from their worldly conceptions of the Messianic Kingdom, were not as yet in a condition to appreciate.

I return, therefore, to the position taken above: the Sermon on the Mount is a formal and express answer to the question, which was on the lips of every one in the vast throng of listeners. All desired to know, all had come there to learn, what this new movement meant; and what was expected from those who took part in it; what they were to gain, and what they were to do and be in order to gain it. Our Lord knew their thoughts, their wants, their longings, in one word, their particular state of mind; and the whole purpose and drift of his discourse was to meet, inform and satisfy it. Evidently it was so understood at the time by all parties, and must, therefore, be so understood now.

If, after what has been said, it should still be contended that the Sermon on the Mount was a Jewish affair, because it was originally addressed to Jews, and abounds in references to the Old Testament, the reply is obvious. The Jews are addressed, not, however, merely as Jews, but as men; moreover, the teachings of the Old Testament, or the construction put upon them, are referred to as utterly insufficient, making it necessary that there should be a restatement of the conditions of Divine favor and acceptance. And this restatement as here given is entirely general, general in all its requirements and in all its promises; thereby showing incontestably that it was not designed for one age only, or for one people only, but for all ages and for all mankind.

Thus much being conceded, we can be at no loss where to go, and where not to go, in order to ascertain what constitutes a Christian.

In the first place, we are not to go to the Old Testament. In saying this, I do not mean to call in question the Divine origin or the Divine authority of the Mosaic dispensation. Some persons find it hard to conceive how any thing coming from an absolutely perfect Being can be otherwise than perfect in itself, and therefore incapable of improvement. But they forget that, in God's dealings with imperfect beings like ourselves, perfection becomes a relative term. That constitution of government, that system of education, that dispensation of religion, is a perfect one, which is perfectly adapted to the condition and wants of the community. In this sense, the Law was as perfect as the Gospel, — nay, for its time and place more so, because more suitable and praclicable. But it by no means follows that the Law is the Gospel. On the contrary, the best thing that can be said of the Law is, that it prepared the way for the Gospel, — “our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ.” We even know that provisions were retained by Moses, not because they were right, nor because he liked them, but because the people were not as yet in a condition to receive any thing better. “And Jesus answered and said unto them, For the hardness of your heart, he wrote you this precept.” It is true that our Lord has said again, in that very Sermon on the Mount which we are now recommending, “Think not that I am come to destroy the Law or the Prophets; I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil.” Here, however, we must understand him as meaning that he had not come to set aside or frustrate what had been the main purpose of all preceding dispensations, namely, the progressive education of the human race, but only to carry out that purpose more fully. Accordingly, he goes on to remind his hearers of what had been “said to them of old time,” on topic after topic, and to set in strong contrast with it, in each case, what he requires, showing incontestably that every preceding dispensation is to be regarded as inadequate and merely provisional.

Under these circumstances, it certainly would not seem a very reasonable course to resort to the Law in order to ascertain what the Gospel enjoins. Yet nothing is more common. Where there is one New Testament Christian, there are two, if not twenty, Old Testament Christians. Look at the importance which the Church of Rome attaches to outward ordinances and an imposing ritual. Not a syllable can be found in the New Testament requiring it, or favoring it, or sanctioning it. Much of it comes from paganism, and the rest from the Old Testament. Protestants, also, though approaching it from another direction, have fallen into the same error of mistaking the Law for the Gospel. Exalting the authority of the Bible, and of the whole Bible, against the authority of tradition and the Church, they have sometimes neglected to make the proper discriminations as to the purpose and use of the several parts of the Bible. Who can read the history of the Scotch Covenanters, or of our Puritan ancestors, without being struck with the fact that their characters, though admirable in many respects, were yet seriously hurt by being modelled to so great an extent, inwardly as well as outwardly, after the heroes of the Old Testament? One of the Apostolic Fathers has said: "It is inconsistent to speak of Jesus Christ, and at the same time to follow Judaism. For Christianity hath not believed in Judaism, but Judaism in Christianity, that those of every tongue, having believed in God, might be united together.”<sup>1</sup>

Again, in order to learn what is essential to the Christian character, we are not to go, as it seems to me, certainly not in the first instance, to the Epistles of Paul. Here the objection is not that the standard is an imperfect one, as in the case of Judaism, but that, from the nature and form of the compositions, it is imperfectly stated or hard to be understood. They are letters written to small communities, struggling under peculiar difficulties and trials, and in danger from peculiar local traditions and prejudices, or from the officious interference of this or that false teacher. Now we say that such writings must, by necessity, be more or less local and temporary both in substance and form. It was not the Apostle's aim to give a full and connected view of what constitutes a Christian, but to impart special instruction, as the case seemed to require; that is to say, to guard the particular community he was addressing against certain errors in opinion or practice, to which he had reason to believe that particular community was especially liable.

I do not deny that we have in these Epistles the application of Christian principles to a great variety of conditions and circumstances; and hence their interest and value. But in order to take these principles and apply them to ourselves, we have first to disengage them from all that is special and peculiar in their form and dress as originally applied by the Apostle; and this is often no easy task. Because we have before us Paul's Epistle to the Romans, or that to the Galatians, it would be presumption in us to assume that we are therefore in a condition to say what sort of an Epistle he would write to the Churches in Boston or Cambridge, if he were now to return to life. From this and other causes, the difficulty of understanding the Apostle was felt and acknowledged even by his contemporaries. Peter, expressly referring to his Epistles, says, "In which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned and unstable wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction." Whence it appears that honesty of purpose and common-sense are not the sole requisites of a safe interpreter of these writings; that the obvious sense is not always the true sense; that the "unlearned," however piously disposed, merely from not knowing how the obvious sense is to be qualified by the occasion and circumstances, may wrest the passage to his own destruction. At the best, all we can hope to do in such cases is to seize and dis-engage the Christian principle which the Apostle intended to apply in a very different state of things from the present, and apply it anew. Certainly, therefore, it would seem to be better and safer to take that very principle, as given in its simplest and most intelligible form in the Sermon on the Mount.

But there are other discourses of our Lord, and above all his life, his own actions and sufferings, to indicate what we ought to be and do in order to become his faithful and consistent followers. And this is true. Far from me the thought to question or undervalue these means of spiritual light and help. Nevertheless, I repeat, it is only in the Sermon on the Mount that the Great Teacher undertakes to give a full and connected statement of what is required of all. His discourses and conversations on other occasions were necessarily brief or fragmentary; or they had special reference to some exigency of his immediate disciples; or they looked rather to the growth of the religion, than to the life of individuals. And what shall I say of our Lord's personal life, as set forth by the Evangelists? As a manifestation of the Divine in the human, as an independent proof that he came from God, more effective on some minds than any other, as a sublime and inspiring impersonation of a perfect moral beauty and holiness, never entirely lost sight of by the Church, however imperfectly understood, its value and importance never have been and never can be overstated. But when you and I proceed to apply this great life to our small concerns, to our ordinary and daily duties, we see at once that we are not expected to do the same things, but only to act from the same principles and dispositions. What these principles and dispositions are, those who can enter entirely into the spirit and significance of our Lord's outward life can gather from that, because they can see the principles and dispositions which underlie it; others must gather them, at least in the first instance, from his teachings. What we need to know most of all is, not our Lord's outward life as given in history, but his inward life, the sources, the springs of his goodness; and these are nowhere set forth so plainly and distinctly as in the Sermon on the Mount, and especially in the Beatitudes, with which it opens.

Obviously, therefore, we must go to this discourse, first of all and above all, if we would know what constitutes a Christian in the highest and best sense of that word. At the same time, in thus defining what I conceive to be the special purpose and use of the Sermon on the Mount, I do not mean to make it to be every thing, and the rest of the Gospel nothing. There are other portions of the New Testament, equally important and necessary, and perhaps more so, though for other purposes and uses; and to these we must go for the history of Christianity, and for many of its evidences, and motives, and sanctions. Take away the rest of the Gospel, and it is hardly to be supposed that much regard would be paid to the Sermon on the Mount. Still it is none the less true, that this Sermon contains the original and authentic statement, from the lips of our Lord himself, of what is peculiar and distinctive in the Christian character, — the Christian ideal of goodness; not merely how good men differ from bad men, but how the good Christian differs from the good pagan, or the good Jew, or the good deist. Here, more distinctly and authoritatively than anywhere else, is set forth that peculiar type or style of holiness by which the real Christian is known.

The practical consequences to be deduced from this position are of great moment.

Experience has shown that the attempt to found a right to the Christian name on doctrinal unity is an idle dream. I do not mean that one theology is as good as another; for this would be to forget that we have intellectual as well as moral wants. As science and civilization advance, and education becomes more and more general, it is of the utmost importance that the doctrines of Christianity should appear to be in harmony with men's ideas on other subjects ; otherwise a general defection from the popular faith, either open or secret, may be expected. But this I say, let a man think as he will as regards mere doctrine ; if it does not hinder him from acting out in his daily life the ideas contained in the Sermon on the Mount, it will not hinder him from being a Christian in the highest and best sense of that term.

A similar remark is applicable to ecclesiastical distinctions and ordinances. To pretend that there can be no salvation out of this or that church is the extreme of arrogance and presumption. Of course there must be some order of worship, and it is natural that men who think alike should worship together. Nay, more ; as men are differently constituted, and have different receptivities, one church may be best for one person, and another for another. "One man," says the Apostle, "esteemeth one day above another : another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind." Observe, however, the condition : every one must be "fully persuaded in his own mind ;" in other words, he must really believe what he professes to believe. And the reason is obvious. No professions, no rites, no observances are likely to be of much avail with one who does not really regard them as of Divine appointment; and, besides, it is really to corrupt our whole moral life at its heart's core, if, in our most solemn intercourse with God, we substitute, for an enlightened and honest belief, a shallow and fashionable make-belief. Be this, however, as it may, what I would now impress upon you is, that no church, no outward and visible church, can be of any service to you or me as Christians, except in so far as it helps us to live the Sermon on the Mount; that is, to act out, in all our relations to ourselves, to society, and to God, the ideas contained therein.

Yes, to be Christians indeed, we must bring our whole lives, inwardly and outwardly, into conformity with "the pattern shown us in the Mount." And here it is to no purpose to say that this is more than any man can do. No man can do it perfectly; but the only legitimate inference from this is, not that he cannot be a Christian in this way, but that he cannot be a perfect Christian in this way or in any other. It does not follow that a man cannot be a Christian, because he cannot be a perfect Christian, any more than it follows that a man cannot be a friend or patriot, because he cannot be a perfect friend or patriot. A man can be a Christian according to his measure and degree; but he can be so on the sole condition of living up to the Sermon on the Mount according to his measure and degree. And this is not all. If we sincerely and earnestly strive to live up to this divine rule in all respects, it will show that we have at least a perfect faith, meaning thereby a perfect spirit of faithfulness, and this faith may be counted for righteousness. That is to say, in the next world we may be rewarded according to what we sincerely and earnestly strove to be and do, — the will as it came from the heart, and was only baffled by the essential infirmities of our nature, being taken for the deed.

Our Lord has not left it for others to tell us whether we are Christians or not; he has told us himself. Can you suppose, therefore, that, in the long discourse in which he has done this, he is to be looked upon as speaking into the air, as laying down a standard and criterion which is above our reach, or which we cannot apply? Remember the words with which it closes: “Therefore whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man who built his house on a rock; and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not, for it was founded on a rock. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man who built his house upon the sand; and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell, and great was the fall of it!”

XXIV.

THE POWER OF CHRIST'S RESURRECTION.

"That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection." — PHILIPPIANS iii. 10.

THE corner-stone of Christianity, considered as an historical religion, is Christ's resurrection. A circumstantial narrative of the fact is given by each of the four Evangelists. It is also again and again referred to, reaffirmed, and dwelt upon by the Apostles, as a cardinal point in the new faith. "Jesus, and the resurrection," to "know him and the power of his resurrection," is the sum and substance of their doctrine.

I am not going to renew an examination of the witnesses to the great historical event here alluded to. I am not going to take up the question of a future life, as if it were still an open question with Christians, for it is not; nor yet to go behind Christianity, with a view to establish the antecedent veraciousness and probability of such a life. All these subjects are well enough in their place; but they do not reach, as it seems to me, the main difficulty; or rather, perhaps I ought to say, they do not meet or supply the main deficiency. The main deficiency is not that of a speculative, but of a practical, faith. In a Christian community like ours, most persons are ready enough to assent, at least in words, to the doctrine of Christ's resurrection, and of the general resurrection; but how few know and feel its "power" as they might and ought!

Some have even gone so far as to maintain that, if the doctrine of a future life were to be struck out of being, it would produce no sensible change in the conduct of mankind. If this statement were confined to a merely speculative faith in the doctrine, and to its direct effect on human conduct, it would not be far from the truth. The reason is that men's actions are not determined and governed, at least not necessarily and immediately, by their speculations; but by example, by habit, by constitutional propensity. It is so in every thing. Because a man's opinions are right, it does not follow that his dispositions are right, or that his conduct will be right. Moreover, it is a mistake to suppose that, in order to convert a speculative faith into a practical faith, nothing else is required but more evidence; that the difference between them is one of degree only. They differ essentially. The former denotes a state of the understanding, the latter a state of the affections and the will ; one we think, the other we live.

What we want is, not merely to see the truth of the doctrine of immortality, but to know and feel its "power." What we want is, habitually to recognize the reality of the spiritual world and a future life, in the same sense and in the same way in which we habitually recognize the reality of the sensible world and the present life.

Let no one say that this supposes either an impossible or a mystical state of mind. An impossible state of mind ! We know it to have been actually attained by multitudes of men and women in different ages and countries, — not merely by Christians, but even by Jews and pagans and Mahometans. I do not mean that such persons think of nothing else but another life ; this would be to neglect their nearest and most imperative relations and duties. But when there is occasion for it, the thought of another life comes in ; and then, not as of something that may be, but as of something that really is. In times of great public anxiety and distress, or of domestic sorrow, or of private disappointment and suffering, their hope is not in man, but in God. Death itself cannot scare or unsettle this hope. How many confessors have stood up for the truth against the world, without a touch of fear ! How many martyrs have been burnt at the stake with songs of triumph on their lips! Knowing that God and eternity were on their side, they did not care who or what was on the other side. To such men, the visible heavens in which the stars shine are not more real, than the invisible heavens in which God reigns.

Equally unfounded is the notion that the state of mind here recommended is mystical or inexplicable, or in any sense extravagant or unreasonable. If we are Christians, or even deists, we must be presumed to accept, in some form or other, the doctrine of a life to come. Look at the monuments, read the inscriptions, in any of your cemeteries: all speak of a life to come. It is the generally received faith. Not one in a thousand buries a child, or a parent, or a dear and venerated friend, with the sad and forlorn impression that he is no more for ever. Some may never have thought much on the subject; others may have great difficulties about it; with some, faith in immortality may be little more than a tradition; with others, little more than a feeling: yet, shadowy and imperfect as the hope is, the offer of all the "kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them," would not tempt them to let it go. Under such circumstances, the wonder, the great practical mystery, is not, I insist, that "the power" of this faith should be felt by so many, but that it should be felt by so few. What more does it suppose or require, but that we should act out our professions, live as we believe, do as we say? And is this mysticism? Is it not the very soul of practical consistency and good sense?

The radical error on this subject consists, as it seems to me, in not recognizing the part which rightfully belongs to the will in matters of practical conviction. We must make a distinction between speculative questions, where the end is opinion, and practical questions, where the end is action. In the latter case, to be for ever deliberating is to forget that it is a practical question. Of course, the will has nothing to do in determining the preponderance of evidence, as evidence; but it has a great deal to do in determining when, on the strength of this preponderance, we shall begin to act. Here, more perhaps than anywhere else, an irresolute will and a corresponding feebleness of character betray themselves, — not in one thing only, but in every thing. The young man who consumes the best part of his life in making up his mind as to what he ought to do, and even then makes it up hesitatingly and with reserves, is not likely to do much. What makes the great statesman, the great military commander, the great man of business, but this very thing,—that he knows how long to deliberate, and when to strike?

And so in religion. I do not mean that there is no occasion here for inquiry and judgment, that there is no distinction between a blind and superstitious worship or service, and an intelligent and rational worship or service. But this I say: there is no proper worship or service of any sort, until it takes a practical form. The turning point in every man's religious experience is, not when he says "I believe," but when he says "I will."

A man is not a Christian in proportion to the amount of truth he puts into his creed, but in proportion to the amount of truth he puts into his life. Accordingly, the great question respecting the doctrine of immortality is, not whether we believe it, but whether we live it. Are we prepared to say, "Discussion has done its work. The evidence for a future state is sufficient for all practical purposes. I will no longer look upon it as a matter in debate, but as a settled point. It shall take its place in all my views and plans of life as a reality, throwing its light on all other realities, and requiring that they should be adjusted to it, and judged by it"? Are you prepared to do this? Are you prepared to say, "I will"? If so, "old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new." You are in a condition, not merely to recognize the truth and importance of an immortal hope, but also to feel its "power."

With this sense, — I do not say with this profession or this belief, but with this sense of immortality on our minds, what will follow?

In the first place, it will help to reconcile us to the inequalities and incongruities of this world. Considered but as the opening scene of an endless career, it is easy to conceive that all will come out right at last. "What I do, thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter." A life of fewer troubles and difficulties and temptations might be less fitted to accomplish the end for which this life was given; it certainly would be less fitted to call out and educate and strengthen personal character. Even the greatest perplexity of all, — difference of moral and religious privilege, — yields to this explanation. How common it is for the men who struggled against the greatest disadvantages in the outset, gaining little by little, to succeed best in the end! The reason is, that these very disadvantages, though a hindrance to progress in the beginning, are the best school for developing a man's latent energies; that is to say, his power to make further progress. Thus a compensation is provided, — less progress, perhaps, up to a given time, but more power for the time to come; and when we consider that the time is infinite, we see it to be compensation which can never fail the deserving.

Again ; a proper sense of immortality will not only reconcile us to life, whatever it may be, but also to death, whenever it may come.

If a man thinks at all on the subject, his mind must be in hopeless perplexity until he has formed a clear, or at least a practical, conception of the leading purpose and end for which he is placed in this world by Divine Providence. If we are to live again, the life that now is must have some connection with that which is to come ; our present state has some bearing on our future state : otherwise, our present existence is a mere excrescence, unconnected with the rest of our being, absolutely without meaning or object, — not even a first step, as it is all to go for nothing, and we are to begin anew. But what is this connection ? What is this bearing ? These questions, of such vital moment to a seeker after truth and happiness, are sufficiently answered, as it seems to me, by saying that the Creator has placed us in this world, under the existing constitution of things, with a view to such an excitement and development of our moral and spiritual nature as will qualify us for action and enjoyment in another world, under a different constitution of things.

Thus is it with our education on earth. This is not begun and completed in one place. And why? Because it is not found to be practicable to teach every thing in one school; but, beginning with the lowest or primary school, we make a certain degree of proficiency there; and then, quitting that school, we go up to a higher, and so on to the highest. Let us not speak disparagingly, much less contemptuously, even of the lowest school, or of the lowest form in the lowest school; for all must begin there. One school is as indispensable as another to the final result, and should be looked back upon with respect and gratitude. Nevertheless, it would be preposterous, as all must perceive, for any one to say that he will never quit the lowest school, that he will complete his education there. He cannot do it: he can only begin his education there. And so with the moral and spiritual training of the immortal soul. It has not been found practicable for our nature to attain its full and perfect development in one place, under one constitution of things, under one set of influences. Hence we are placed here in order to receive our first discipline, to put forth our first efforts, to learn our first lessons, and so to make a beginning. Still, all we can do here, at the best, is merely to make a beginning.

Many, I fear, look upon death as if it would put a period to our progress; but in point of fact it is intended to prevent a period being put to our progress. This life is one step in our being, and but one step; we die that we may take another step. We go as far as we can go in this world; we die that we may go farther, that we may go on to perfection. You would not wonder to hear a child say, "I would not be a child always." And why not? Because you think it natural and reasonable for the child to wish that, as he is prepared for it, he may be admitted to a wider sphere of duty, activity, and enjoyment. But is it not equally natural and reasonable for a man to wish that, as he is prepared for it, he also may be admitted to a still higher sphere of duty, activity, and enjoyment? If the child would not stop with being a child, but hopes to become something more and better, why should not man be unwilling to stop with being a mortal man, but hope to become something more and better? I repeat it, we do not die that we may stop; we die, that we may go on.

Moreover, a living and practical faith in immortality will help to reconcile us to death, come when it may; — that is, to an early death, or to waiting for it in extreme old age.

We can understand that men must die, for so it is decreed in their very organization, — as the leaves fall in autumn; but the leaves do not fall in spring. It has ever been accounted one of the darkest and most painful mysteries in Divine Providence, that so many, in the flush of health and spirits, full of promise, with their work but just begun, and knit by a thousand ties to loving hearts, should be suddenly cut off, while the old and infirm and worn out still linger on, often against their will. Perhaps the best answer to this difficulty is found in our incompetency to fathom the Divine counsels. But though we cannot understand particular cases, it is not difficult to see that the general law under which they take place is wise and good.

Consider, for a moment, what would follow if childhood, and youth, and early manhood were exempt from mortality; if, for example, nobody died until he was sixty. Is it not as certain as it is that man is man, that the early part of life would be given, by the great majority, to thoughtlessness and present indulgence, or to extreme worldliness; and that all earnest self-culture, and all serious preparation for eternity, would be postponed to near the close of the period on which they could certainly calculate? Who has yet to learn that most persons are extremely indisposed to act, and that many seem wholly incapable of acting, earnestly and decidedly for a remote object? God, therefore, by making us liable to death from the moment we begin to breathe, and by making us feel that death is continually impending over us, has wisely and mercifully so arranged it as to make our mortality an ever-present motive or restraint. Hence the secret of the amazing power exerted over mankind by the thought of death; which does more, as I firmly believe, to keep alive a spirit of religion in the world, and, through that, a spirit of virtue and order, than all other causes put together. There are doubtless higher principles than this, and men who can enter into the spirit of these higher principles; nevertheless, take away from the bulk of mankind the motives and restraints to be found in the mysterious overhanging of death, and I do not believe that society could be held together. And the power of this thought, let me remind you, is not found in the final certainty of death, but in the certainty that it may come at any moment.

And besides, why say of those who die early, that they die prematurely, their destiny interrupted and broken off? We never shall think justly, rationally, consistently of death, until we come to look upon it, not theoretically alone, but practically, as being neither more nor less than a change of abode for the immortal spirit. Putting away all the illusions of the senses and the imagination on this subject, and giving ourselves up to the impressions and convictions of our better nature, illuminated and confirmed as they are by the Word and the Spirit of God, we must come to regard death in no other light than as a transition from one mode of existence to another. To be Christians indeed, we must habitually feel and act under a deep and abiding assurance that what we call death is not the extinction of a single particle of real life; but only the separation from life of all that is mortal, that nothing but life may remain. What we call death takes place, and "mortality is swallowed up of life." The dead, then, are not dead. Our friends, who are absent from the body, are present with the Lord. They are not here, but they are there; they live, — fully to carry out, under more favorable circumstances, every purpose for which they were created.

Is it not a presentiment of this which makes the death-bed of the young, as a general rule, so much more bright and hopeful than that of the old? Death itself would wear a harder and more repulsive look to us all, if we did not so frequently see it reflected back upon us from the placid and beautiful faces of those whom the world has never touched with its sorrows or its cares.

And what shall I say of old age? Very far is it from being barren of uses and satisfactions. In the primitive ages, when wisdom was found in personal experience, and not in traditions or in books, the old were looked up to for counsel or authority more than now. Even now, however, there is a beautiful and touching reverence everywhere paid to men remarkable for their virtues and their years. But there is one great drawback: so far as this world is concerned, old men must live in their recollections, and not in their hopes. Cicero has been complimented for the ingenious turn he has given to this objection. "An old man," he says, "has nothing indeed to hope for; yet he is in so much the happier state than a young man, since he has already attained what the other only hopes for." But this will hardly satisfy. That we have lived to some purpose should reconcile us to having lived, but it has nothing to do with our continuing to live. I can think of nothing more dreary than to be waiting for death, without having that death lighted up and transfigured by an unshaken trust in another life.

There is no ignoring, there is no concealing the inconveniences, the infirmities, which steal over us as we descend into the vale of years. What is to give peace, contentment, and dignity to the evening of our days? It is a great thing, for an old man to retain his faculties and his natural cheerfulness to the last. It is a great thing, to keep up his interest in good objects, and in his favorite studies and pursuits. It is a great thing, to be surrounded by kind friends, and all the endearments and appliances of a happy home. But greater than all, "to know Christ, and the power of his resurrection," — as a hope full of immortality. With this hope, he still has something to live for, and something to die for. This world and all it contains are fading away ; but his eyes are fixed on "a better country, that is, a heavenly," — "a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."

XXV.

OUR DUTY IN RESPECT TO OTHER MEN'S CONSCIENCES.

"Conscience, I say,—not thine own, but of the other."—1 CORINTHIANS, x. 29.

IF there were but one conscience in the world, and that were mine, my course would be plain and straightforward, so far, at least, as conscience is concerned. I should only have to settle it in my own mind what is right, and that would be right;—right for me, and right for everybody. Other men, not having any consciences of their own, if they wished to act conscientiously, would have to regulate their conduct by my opinion of right. They would have to look at me, and do as they see me do. Men's consciences have sometimes been called their watches; each one consults his own: but in the circumstances here supposed, my conscience would be more than that; it would be the Town Clock.

But in point of fact it is far otherwise. There are as many consciences as there are individuals; and what makes it worse is, that these consciences, to all appearance, are not agreed. They do not always lead the same way; they often lead different, and sometimes opposite, ways, even in matters of public interest and duty. Your conscience says, this ought to be done; my conscience says, that ought to be done; and, in such cases, what shall be done? Shall your conscience give way to mine? Or mine to yours? Or shall both give way, some compromise being adopted? Or shall neither give way voluntarily, — the question, What is right? being left to turn on the question, Which is the stronger?

Naturalists tell us of animals which cannot be turned from their course; so that, when two chance to meet, each begins to raise himself on his legs as high as possible, and the one which can raise himself the highest, travels directly over the other's head. Something like this not unfrequently takes place among men, when they come into collision with one another on the ground of contested right. The two parties meet, but instead of making room for each other on terms of mutual concession and respect, they follow the example of the animals referred to above. Taking their stand on what they call conscience, they immediately begin to stretch themselves up as high as possible; and that party which can make itself the superior in prestige or influence, or popular clamor, travels directly over the other's head.

As might be presumed from what is known of the overbearing and despotic propensities of human nature, this evil has always existed to a greater or less degree; and many things at the present day, though in themselves good, tend to increase it. I allude here especially to the progress and diffusion of knowledge and civil and religious liberty. In proportion as men become enlightened and free, each man's individual judgment stands for more, and, at the same time, mere tradition, mere authority, and, I may add, mere law, stand for less. Under these circumstances, a man of an arbitrary and despotic turn of mind is more likely than ever to set up his own conscience, or that of his party or clique, as the standard of right, other men's consciences to the contrary notwithstanding.

Hence the growing importance, in a practical point of view, of looking into this whole subject a little more carefully. What is due to the plea of conscience, — "conscience, I say, not thine own, but of the other"? What is our duty as Christians in respect to other men's consciences, especially when from any cause they happen to be at variance, and perhaps in conflict, with our own and the public conscience?

We are first to ascertain whether the plea of conscience is well-founded. There is more room for this question than is commonly supposed. All is not conscience that passes for it in this world. And here I do not refer wholly, or mainly, to deliberate hypocrisy, to false appearances, to men pretending to be what they are not. Undoubtedly there is not a little even of this; undoubtedly there is not a little of hollow pretence in modern society, and we naturally look for it among those who pretend to the most. When a man lays claim to a great deal of conscience in one matter, and yet shows only a common degree of conscience in other matters, we have a right to suspect him.

Be that, however, as it may, what I would chiefly insist upon here is, that men are continually mistaking what constitutes conscience. Let it be that a man is both sincere and consistent, it does not necessarily follow that he is conscientious in any proper sense of that word. Nay, more, he may be devoted to a particular measure, or system, or party, and be ready to make great sacrifices for it, and even to die for it, and yet not for conscience' sake. It may be, undoubtedly it often is, pride of opinion, or mere persistency or obstinacy of character. There are multitudes with whom a stiff adherence to ground once taken has very little to do with morality; it has a great deal more to do with temper. We have had more than enough of this determination, on the part of headstrong men, to act out their purposes under the name of conscience, though the heavens fall. It is a mistake to suppose that such a disposition argues, of itself, extraordinary conscientiousness; much oftener it originates in extraordinary self-confidence and presumption, and a determination to have one's own way. Extraordinary conscientiousness always supposes an extreme anxiety to be right, as well as to do right; and wherever this anxiety exists, it must certainly induce some degree of caution, hesitancy, self-distrust. The zealot, therefore, who rushes on, manifesting none of this caution, none of this hesitancy and self-distrust, may be a man of courage and daring; he may count his life as a very small thing compared with the objects he has in view; he may strike hard and strike home: but it is a palpable mistake to single him out as illustrating the power of conscience. In nine cases out of ten, it is the power of will.

Let us now take another step. Assuming that the plea of conscience is well-founded, assuming a man really to act from a sense of right, what value or authority does this circumstance alone give to his opinion of right?

Some persons, I believe, are not a little puzzled in making it out, how two disputants can be equally conscientious, though on opposite sides of the question as to what ought to be done in a particular case. But it is because they do not begin by clearing up their conception of conscience itself. Conscience, properly so called, belongs to our emotional, and not to our intellectual, nature. It is a sensibility and not a judgment; it is a feeling that we ought to do right, leaving us, however, to make up our opinion as to what is right in particular cases, as we make up our opinion on other subjects, and with the same liability to difference, change, and mistake. Accordingly, though we come to widely different conclusions as to what ought to be done in particular cases, it does not follow that we differ at all in our love of right, or in our sense of moral obligation; that is to say, in conscience, properly so called. In other words, it is not conscience against conscience, but merely opinion against opinion; and, what is more, one fallible opinion against another fallible opinion.

Keeping in mind the distinction here pointed out, it is easy to see the only ground on which any man can claim respect for his opinion of right in difficult matters. It is not that he is more conscientious, but that he is more intelligent, and more intelligent in respect to the particular question at issue. In a great majority of cases, the right is so obvious and patent as to raise no question, the only thing which keeps men from doing it being a want of conscience. The continual recurrence of such instances has probably led to the mistake, that conscience alone is all-sufficient, informing us what to do, as well as commanding us to do it. But the moment we are in serious doubt as to what ought to be done, the conviction is forced upon us that no degree of mere conscientiousness will supply the place of study, experience, and a sound mind. Hence it often happens that we entertain a sincere respect for a man's sense of right, but no sort of respect for his opinion of right. If it is a question of statesmanship, he must know statesmanship; if it is a question of law, he must know law; if it is a question of commercial or social or moral reform, he must be versed in all the difficulties and intricacies and entanglements of these subjects: else, no matter how conscientious he may be, his opinion of right is not worth a straw.

Here, however, another question arises. What is to be done with a man who conscientiously holds "opinions of right" deemed not only worthless, but injurious, and perhaps fatally so? Some persons of a speculative vein, not at all inclined to be persecutors themselves, insist nevertheless that the logic of persecution is irrefragable. If the Church really believes that an obnoxious heresy is fatal to morals and religion, how can the toleration of it be reconciled with notions of public duty, or even with compassion for the infected individuals? Under the name of sanitary or quarantine regulations, we enact stringent laws, and inflict heavy penalties, in order to prevent the spread of a contagion which threatens to kill the body. On the same principle, and from a similar though much higher motive, ought we not to do at least as much to prevent the spread of a contagion which threatens to kill the soul?

I answer, that for any man, or any body of men, large or small, laic or cleric, to lay down their opinions, however honestly entertained, as an ultimate standard of truth, is to forget that they are fallible beings. It is practically to assume that they are infallible, when they know they are not. In other words, it begins by assuming as true what they know to be false; and if so, then every form of despotism in matters of faith, every form of spiritual domination, must be acknowledged to have its root in a manifest contradiction and lie. Perhaps some will argue, that what I think to be true is the truth for me, at least for the time being. And this in a certain sense, and with certain limitations, must be conceded. Mark, however, the words,—the truth for me. Because it is the truth for me, it does not follow that it is the truth for my neighbor;—certainly not, if he happens to think differently. On the contrary, if there is any force in the argument here insisted on, — that is to say, if what I think to be true is the truth for me, then it would seem to follow, that what my neighbor thinks to be true is in the same sense, and to the same extent, the truth for him; so that we find here a ground, not for punishing or restraining dissent, but for universal toleration.

The Church of Rome, aware of this objection, thinks to save her consistency by professing to build nothing on opinion against opinion, nor even on accord of mere human opinion, untrustworthy at the best, especially as regards “the things of God.” She claims absolute infallibility in matters of faith; but it is on the ground of a Divine inspiration perpetually renewed. And this would be very well, except for one circumstance. The inspiration thus confidently asserted, by which I mean the fact of the inspiration, must be proved; and here there is nothing but opinion against opinion, and, what is more, nothing but one human and fallible opinion against another human and fallible opinion: for, of course, it will not do to plead the inspiration, while the very question at issue is whether there really is any inspiration or not. Obviously, therefore, the boasted consistency of Romanism resolves itself, for the most part, into a trick of logical sleight-of-hand. It consists in so shuffling out of sight the question of the fact of the inspiration, that what is manifestly the previous and main question, indeed the question of questions, is made to seem as if it were no question at all, in short, as if it were something which everybody is to begin by taking for granted.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that the fundamental doctrine of consistent Protestantism, entire freedom of thought, remains untouched. So much at least is due to conscience; "conscience. I say, not thine own. but of the other." We may feel little or no respect for another man's opinions of right, but we must nevertheless respect his right to the opinions, at any rate until he begins to act them out.

I have said, "until he begins to act them out," — which brings up another question of greater difficulty and perplexity. What shall be done with a man, who, in acting out his honest convictions of duty, comes into conflict with law?

Exciting and embarrassing as this subject is under some of its aspects, there are two or three things respecting it, which are sufficiently plain. In the first place, law, to be law, must be taken as an expression, not of arbitrary will, but of the public opinion of right, of the public conscience as at present instructed. When, therefore, we consider and pay a proper respect and deference to law, it is not to forsake conscience and follow another guide. We still follow conscience, and not the less conscience because it is the collective conscience of the community. But am I not called upon to give up my own conscience in favor of this so-called public conscience? No such thing. I am not even so much as called upon to give up my own opinion of right, when it differs from that expressed in the law. All that I am called upon to do is to refrain from acting it out; and this too, as a general rule, and in ordinary times, no farther than my own conscience, in view of my duty as a good citizen, prompts and requires.

Again, the law restrains the fanatic from acting out new, dangerous, incendiary doctrines, or punishes him for it, not with a view to invade his rights, but to hinder him from invading the rights of others. So long as his conduct injures nobody but himself, it is seldom, if ever, that the law interferes; but as soon as it begins to injure others, it is preposterous to suppose that they will bear it, or that society will suffer it. Society, government, the State, is, and must be, of the nature of a compromise; each one giving up a part of his natural liberty of action, that he may retain and be protected in the rest. And this is not a mere human contrivance, but the will and decree of God; for God has evidently made us to live in society, and society cannot exist without it. Now we say, that to be continually playing fast and loose in this matter, to give it up to-day and take it back to-morrow, is not conscience; it is not even rational liberty; it is a breach of contract; it is sheer injustice and wrong. Room is still left for the true martyr. All honor to the true martyr; but the true martyr is one who suffers himself for his opinions, — not one who makes other men suffer.

And besides, nobody will pretend that conscientiousness is the whole of goodness; we are to take into view a man's tastes and dispositions in other respects. The radical error and vice of every form of fanaticism consists in practically disregarding this obvious fact; in presuming that mere conscientiousness, mere fidelity to one's opinions, will make up for the lack of any other and every other needed grace. St. Paul was of a different mind. In looking back on the exterminating zeal with which, while a mere stripling, he had hunted down the Christians, he saw at once that there was nothing in the circumstance of his being self-deceived, nothing in the plea of the honesty of his convictions, to justify or excuse his self-confidence, his arrogance, his precipitancy, his cruelty. He knew that these qualities of character are always bad, however connected; that they are as bad in conscientious men as in unconscientious men, and ought to be restrained

Undoubtedly, under every human government there are bad laws ; undoubtedly, there is a higher law ; but it is a mournful, not to say a shameful, thing, if the so-called " higher law " represents the ignorance and the passions of the community, and not its intelligence and sober judgment. So long as the world stands in need of agitators and reformers, there will be occasion from time to time for bold and daring spirits, who are for compromising nothing, who are for carrying out their new theories, come what may. When such men appear, there is a touch of heroism about them, which fascinates like military glory, and causes them to be lauded much above their deserts. Be this, however, as it may, thus much is plain : they are exceptional men alike in their office and their virtues, and, when out of place, become a social pest.

One word, in conclusion, on what is due to the scruples of those who are offended and hurt by our freedom, — the scruples, as the Scriptures express it, of the " weak " brethren.

Of course, the spirit of concession in such cases must have its limits ; otherwise the " weak " brethren would virtually rule. And again, it must not be claimed on the ground of absolute right, but on that of Christian tenderness and solicitude for the good, and especially for the moral good, of others.

Thus qualified and explained, it seems to me that a constant anxiety lest our own example, however justifiable in itself, may have the effect to lead astray the inexperienced and weak, is the natural growth of the Christian consciousness, and indeed the spontaneous act of every truly generous mind. In the words of the apostle, "All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient: all things are lawful for me, but all things edify not."

I know it is an old objection, "Why is my liberty judged of another man's conscience?" Why am I called upon to give up rights and privileges, or even lawful and reasonable indulgences, merely to humor the scruples of the weak-minded? But this is not stating the case fairly. We have many rights which, however, we have a right to waive; nay, more, rights which under certain circumstances we feel that we ought to waive, and do waive. Neither is it any infringement of our liberty. Grant that I am at full liberty to partake of this or that indulgence on the ground of its innocence and reasonableness; it must also be conceded, on the other hand, that I am at liberty not to partake of it. I am at liberty to partake of it or not, as I please; and if from any reason or motive I please not to partake of it, this is just as much a vindication and exercise of my liberty as if I were to indulge myself without restraint. And why talk about being called upon to do this merely to humor the scruples of the weak-minded? We are not called upon to do it merely to humor the scruples of anybody. We are called upon to do it, that we may not unnecessarily offend or disturb another man's faith, or hurt his conscience, or make him weak, or lead him into temptation, thus putting an occasion to fall in a brother's way. Now I ask any one, and every one who professes to act on Christian principles, or indeed to have the feelings of a man, whether this is not reason and motive enough for practising a little self-restraint?

After all, however, there is a higher duty we owe to the consciences of the weak and ignorant, than that of consulting their scruples; I mean the duty of enlightening and strengthening their consciences, and making them truly Christian. Starting with the mistaken notion that conscience is a light as well as a motive, many persons slide into the error of supposing that conscience alone is a sufficient guide; that every one knows what is required of him, whether he practises it or not. It is far otherwise. Very probably the bulk of mankind know what is required of them in order to stand well with their neighbors, or to maintain credit in business, or to hold up their heads in what is called good society. But they do not know what is required of them in order to enter into the Kingdom of Heaven; they do not know the degree to which inward purity and the higher virtues are insisted on in the New Testament; they do not even so much as know what constitutes the peculiar type and style of Christian righteousness, by which it is distinguished from the righteousness of the pagan or the Jew. It is precisely here, therefore, as I conceive, that Christian instruction is most needed;—not that men may have consciences, for they will have consciences of some sort or other at any rate; but that they may have Christian consciences. The great and essential peculiarity of the Gospel is found, as it seems to me, not in its doctrine of God, nor in its doctrine of ordinances, but in its doctrine of holiness. “For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? Do not even the publicans the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? Do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.”

XXVI.

PERFECTION THE CHRISTIAN'S AIM.

“Therefore, leaving the principles of the doctrine of Christ, let us go on unto perfection.” — HEBREWS vi. 1.

HOWEVER unlikely or impossible it is that we shall ever meet with a perfect man on this earth, still, if we were to meet with one, we should see, that, instead of being a monster, he would be of all men the most entirely natural, the most truly human. It is no objection to this, that when we see one yielding to a burst of inordinate passion, or carried away by excessive love of fame, or money, or pleasure, we are apt to say, “See there human nature, — poor human nature!” And so we do, in a certain sense of that word, and perhaps in the most common sense; for the propensity in question is a human propensity, and in its existing and disproportionate state of development it is natural that a man should give way to it. It is a development of our nature which makes the miser or the voluptuary, but not, I contend, a natural development of our nature ; and this is a distinction which a discriminating thinker will be careful to observe. For there is a natural development of our nature, and an unnatural development of our nature. The miser and the voluptuary become what they are in consequence of a development of human nature ; but then it is in consequence of an unnatural, one-sided, distorted development of human nature. If human nature were developed naturally, that is to say, according to its just and intended order and proportions, there would be no misers or voluptuaries. The misers and the voluptuaries, — they are the monsters.

But if a perfect man would be so natural in all his ways, if human perfection would be nothing but a full and perfect development of human nature in its just and natural order and proportions, how happens it, some may ask, that we never meet with some of these paragons, — one, at least, in a nation, one in an age ? Let me answer this question by bringing into view an analogous and familiar fact. Go into a forest, — nay, go from forest to forest, — and you cannot find a single perfect tree ; perfect, I mean, in every branch, in every leaf. Yet such a tree would be only true to its nature, — that is, perfectly natural. Most clearly, if such a tree could be found, it would not be a monster.

Perhaps I shall be told that the impossibility of actually finding such a tree is owing to external influences, — to the soil, the frost, the insects, the mildew. And so it is. But so, too, it is with man. His nature also, while in its course of development, comes under countless influences from without of a most diverse character and tendency, some of which begin to operate before he is born, some of which are wrought into his physical organization, and some of which essentially modify his education and the whole structure of his moral and social being. Now under such diverse and conflicting influences we do not say that he will become wholly bad or wholly good ; but we do say that the character he forms will be a mixed character ; it will not be a perfect character. The race growing up under such circumstances will not be divisible into the perfectly good and the perfectly bad ; but every individual will be partly good and partly bad. Every man's character will be, and must be, and is, mixed.

Accordingly Mr. Wesley has defined human perfection as being “ such a degree of the love of God and the love of man, such a degree of the love of justice, truth, holiness, and purity, as will remove from the heart every contrary disposition towards God or man ; and that should be our state of mind in every situation, in every circumstance of life.”

Even he, however, admits that this perfection, at its greatest height, does not include absolute freedom from error or mistake, nor exclude the possibility of continual progress in knowledge and holiness. We also find, that, as he grew older and wiser, and saw more of the abuses to which the doctrine of perfection is liable, he was more and more disposed to modify it and soften it down; until, in writing to one of his female disciples, who seems to have applied for advice under a desponding sense of her imperfection, he could say, "Indeed, my judgment is, that (in this case particularly) to overdo is to undo; and that to set perfection too high is the most effectual way of driving it out of the world."

Still, it is not to be denied that the advocates even of a nominal and qualified perfectionism, like this, have done not a little to suggest and foster hurtful and dangerous errors. In the first place, they have led men to be content with inward states, — with an ideal and dreamy sort of goodness; as if nothing more were required of us than that our general intentions and affections should be right; or as if, though our general intentions and affections are right, we may not sin in particular acts, or in particular manifestations of feeling. Again, they have given countenance and currency to false and extremely unsafe views of temptation, by encouraging persons, who think their hearts have been changed, to believe that now they are in no danger; that now they may expose themselves without fear to any form of seduction, — as if we did not know that the best men are liable to temptation, and liable to it the more in the same proportion as they are thrown off their guard by an overweening sense of their superiority to it. Worse than all, perfectionism is apt to degenerate into Antinomianism, perhaps the most pestilent and stupendous of all the perversions of religion; which teaches the indifference of outward conduct in the regenerate, making even injustice and sensuality to be no longer of the nature of sin, when committed by those who have once been renewed by the grace of God.

We set aside, therefore, all expectation of actually meeting with perfection among men; we confidently believe that under Christianity, as under Judaism, “there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good and sinneth not.” Still there is nothing to hinder us from maintaining, as the Scriptures seem to do, the doctrine of human perfectibility. Perfectibility, as here used, differs from perfection in this, — that a man may be pronounced perfectible though he never attains to perfection in fact, provided only that there is nothing in his nature itself to exclude the possibility of his perfection, and nothing in his circumstances to exclude the possibility of his continually going on towards perfection.

While, therefore, we give up human perfection, we stand fast for human perfectibility. There are no arbitrary or determinate bounds set to any man's progress in this life, whatever may be his condition and circumstances. You cannot say, "He can go so far, and there he must stop. He can go so far, and there he will meet a bar which will make further progress impossible." There is no such bar. The way is open to every one; or, if not entirely open, there is nothing in the nature of the obstructions which makes them absolutely insuperable. I do not say that, in every instance, a man can leap over these obstructions at an easy or a single bound. Sometimes he will be able to surmount them only by patience and toil; and sometimes he will have to cut his way through them with courage and force. All I affirm is, that there is nothing in the nature of these obstructions, or of any other obstructions, which must needs bring his self-improvement to a stand for a day or an hour, so long as his faculties retain their natural vigor. Even while struggling with the difficulty in question, and before he has succeeded in mastering it, if he struggles manfully and in a true spirit, he is continually growing wiser and better and stronger in himself through the new demand thus made on his energies, and the new exercise to which his faculties are thus put. I repeat it, then: no limit is fixed or can be fixed to any man's progress, so long as his faculties retain their natural vigor, except by his own consent. I do not say, simply, that man is a progressive being, but also that he is a being capable of unlimited progress; so that, of course, there is nothing too high for him to aim at, and nothing too good or too great to become the object of his aspirations.

This is all which I understand the Scriptures to mean in the text, and in other passages where they enjoin it upon us to be perfect, to go on unto perfection, and to become perfect men in Christ Jesus. They do not hold up this perfection as something of which any Christian can as yet be personally conscious, or on which he can look back as already attained; but as the goal in the distance after which all can and should continually aspire. "Not as though I had already attained," said an apostle, "or were already perfect; but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended; but this one thing I do,—forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

So far, then, and only so far, can the Christian doctrine of human perfectibility be fairly urged. Man is not only made capable of progress, but, with the aids which the Gospel supplies, of unlimited progress. The consequence is, that he cannot only conceive of an ideal perfection, and see that perfection realized in Jesus Christ, but make it the object of his own aspirations, — not in his dreams alone, but in actual life, as there really is nothing in the way of his continually advancing towards it but the weakness or the perverseness of his own will. It is man himself who sets limits to his own wisdom and virtue; and this he does by resting content with the degree of wisdom and virtue he has already attained, or by not choosing to make the efforts or the sacrifices necessary to further progress. It is a false and mean shifting of the blame from himself on something else, to say that these limits were ordained by his nature, or his circumstances, or his Creator. It never is so. I do not suppose that all men, with their different capacities and opportunities, are capable of an equally rapid progress; but I do suppose that they are equally capable of making some progress, and this, too, without limit, intermission, or end. There are no exceptions to this law. It is the universal condition of humanity. I know that we are not all spirit. We have a body as well as a soul, — a body with its grovelling appetites and tastes, and earthly tendencies, to weigh us down and keep us from realizing in this life many of our brightest visions. But even while we continue connected with this body, and in some sense the slaves of it, we do not work like slaves tethered to a pillar or a rock, which will let us go so far and no farther. We work rather like slaves with a clog, — we can go as far as we please, only we must carry our clog with us; but with this cheering consciousness from day to day, that, the greater our progress in wisdom and virtue, the less the clog is felt, until it is hardly perceptible as an obstacle, or even as a burden, in our onward course.

And here let it be distinctly understood, that, when we speak of human perfectibility, we do not bring it in as a weak rhetorical flourish, or as a fine-sounding word which will help to point a moral or turn a period. We mean all that we assert; we bring into notice a sober fact, which has much to do with the direction and government of every man's daily conduct. We can go on continually towards perfection, though we never arrive at it; we can make it to be our goal in the distance, after which we are continually to aspire, and which in reality we can and ought continually to approximate. If we stop in the way, it is of our own accord, and not because we are obliged to stop. We can go on, if we please. Some, doubtless, can go on faster than others; but all can go on. This is the great truth which lies at the bottom of every well-grounded and immortal hope; which we are not at liberty to wink out of sight, or overlay and bury up under miserable commonplaces borrowed from superficial views of life and human nature, or the shortsighted cunning of this world. Bring me the man who has become so wise that he cannot become any wiser. You cannot do it. Bring me the man who has become so good that he cannot become any better. You cannot do it. You cannot fill a man's mind with knowledge until it cannot hold any more, as you can fill a vessel with water until it cannot hold any more. On the contrary, every new acquisition of truth only serves to enlarge his mind for the comprehension of more truth, so that the more he knows the more is he in a condition to learn. And the same is likewise true of his progress in virtue. Because he mastered one bad habit yesterday, that has not destroyed but only increased his power to master another bad habit to-day; because he put forth one new virtue yesterday, that has not destroyed but only increased his power to put forth another to-day : and so on, without any assignable limits. The Bible fixes no limits, our nature fixes none ; neither reason nor imagination can fix any. But this ability to go on involves the obligation to go on. If he stops, no matter in what stage of his progress, he goes backward ; for in stopping he ceases to improve, — and this is not merely not to obey, it is to disobey. He must go on ; and thus it is, and only thus, that the path of the righteous, at first dimly and uncertainly seen, grows brighter and brighter to the perfect day.

Let me add, that I express the doctrine too tamely when I say that a man is capable of unlimited progress. There burns within him an instinctive desire of growth, of ceaseless progress. This principle begins to manifest itself long before that of a cool and calculating selfishness. You see it in the boy, who is not satisfied unless he can spin his top, or fly his kite, better and better ; and he would feel this desire, and find pleasure in its gratification, even if he dwelt alone on a desolate island, apart from all thoughts of interest or rivalship. Or if you call it rivalship, then I should say that every man is made, in the very constitution of his nature, to be the rival of his past self. We see it also in the artist, whose eye has caught glimpses of an unearthly beauty, which he strives to bring out and embody on the canvas or in marble. And at last, perhaps, he succeeds ; but now his eye has caught glimpses of a beauty still more transcendent, and he is not satisfied until he can realize that. And thus it is that his ideal of excellence in art for ever flies before him ; but not in vain, as it only flies to beckon him on from excellence to excellence, and from glory to glory. The same principle takes effect also in our whole moral and spiritual life ; for we are so made, that, if our minds are in a healthy state, we are never entirely satisfied with what we are. We are always seeking to rival and outdo our former selves ; but no harm is likely to come of emulation or of competition, so long as a man is his own rival : or of ambition, if it does but consist in this inextinguishable thirst for excellence itself.

There is however one danger to be apprehended from a too exclusive occupation of the mind on ideal visions of excellence and perfection, which I ought to notice distinctly before I conclude. Persons of this description, it has been said, “ are deeply impressed with the idea that they are required to be perfect before God ; but their idea of perfection being altogether of an abstract and spiritual character, the zealous fulfilment of ordinary duties, and a conscientious attention to common transactions, seem to have no affinity to their object ; and hence they direct all their longings to a state of spiritual and vague feeling, of which they know not either the form or limits, and the desire of which has no tendency but to unfit them for all effectual and successful discharge of the duties of life. It is perhaps the besetting error of those who are commonly denominated serious and pious men, and it is also not unfrequently the last refuge of those, who, having run, in preceding portions of their lives, a career of thoughtlessness and folly, at last betake themselves to this vain sighing after perfection, — instead of devoting themselves, as true wisdom would direct them, to a zealous and persevering reformation of their whole plan of life, and to an effectual discharge of every duty pointed out to them, as active and social, as religious and moral beings.”

There is much good sense and force in this caution; but it only shows that the instinctive desire of perfection, which is wrought into our very constitution, may be misconceived, perverted, and abused. The idea of perfection is held up before us, not to be the object of vain longings and sighings, but to cheer and sustain us in the many weary steps we must take in its pursuit. We are still to reflect that we must actually traverse, with our own feet, the almost measureless distance that separates us from the far-off goal; and also, that, if a man is to go round the globe, he cannot take any longer strides than if he were going to the next village. Besides, perfection after all is our ultimate object; not our next and immediate object. Our next and immediate object, both as men and as Christians, is always the faithful discharge of the common and obvious and present duties which press upon us in that particular sphere of activity, be it high or low, in which Divine Providence has placed us.

Only a small and comparatively inconsiderable part of this unlimited progress in knowledge and holiness is to be wrought out here, even by the most diligent and best disposed. But we can begin it here; perhaps I ought to say, we must begin it here; for there may be something in the character of the first attainments of spiritual growth, in consequence of which, if we throw away our opportunity of making them here, it may never be offered to us again. Heaven itself, for aught we know to the contrary, may be a place in which it is impossible for a man to begin a life of faith and prayer. However this may be, is it not a glorious thought that we can begin the career of angels and archangels in these dwellings of dust? How much more glorious the thought, that, when these dwellings of dust are dissolved, we shall "be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven!" But who shall dare to anticipate, even in imagination, the stupendous disclosures that are to burst upon the disembodied spirit? Of one thing, however, we may be sure; a never-ending, ever-brightening career of knowledge, improvement, and happiness will still spread itself out before the followers of Christ,—the same which they began here. And, along the innumerable ranks of the heavenly host, a voice will still be heard proclaiming the law, “Let us go on unto perfection!”

FOR THERE IS ONE GOD, AND ONE MEDIATOR BETWEEN GOD AND MEN, THE MAN CHRIST JESUS. — 1 Timothy ii. 5.

THE sense of man's need of a Mediator did not spring up for the first time in Christianity. It seems to have had its origin in a feeling of the distance, the incomprehensibleness, the unapproachableness of the unseen object of fear and worship. Common men were afraid to speak to God; they did not conceive themselves to be in a condition to speak to him face to face. Accordingly, they looked round for some person or persons, bolder or holier than they, who would speak to God for them, — whether to ask his aid, or to acknowledge his goodness, or to appease his anger.

Hence, for the most part, the priesthoods of the ancient world; for it was out of this sentiment of ignorance, and awe, and human unworthiness, that nearly all of what was good or bad in the priestly office arose. We see its beginnings even in barbarous tribes, where there is almost always one or more who, in the character of magicians or necromancers, are resorted to by the rest, as having intercourse and influence with the invisible powers. In India and in Egypt the same idea was elaborately carried out in the organization of an hereditary sacerdotal caste, arrogating to itself the exclusive right of mediating between earth and heaven. And so of Greece and Rome ; for though in their best days this assumption on the part of the priests was reduced and limited in many ways, it was by no means extinct. If Socrates would consult the Oracle at Delphi, he must do it through a priestess of the temple ; if Augustus would know the will of the Gods as to the conduct of the war, there must be a diviner in the camp.

Turning next to the Hebrews, we find a people whose very form of government, a theocracy, made it necessary that almost everything should be done through mediators between God and men. Moses, by whom the Law came, was eminently "a mediator," and is expressly so denominated in the New Testament. He also says of himself in Deuteronomy, "I stood between the Lord and you at that time, to show you the word of the Lord." Hence, too, the appointment of Aaron and his posterity as a perpetual priesthood, to act as so many "mediators," through whom alone the people were to have access to Jehovah in the solemn and imposing service of the Temple. The people did not offer up their own sacrifices; they brought the victims or oblations to the priest, who made the offering in their name and stead. The people did not so much as enter the vestibule of the temple: even in the solemn atoning service, which was for the whole nation, the priests alone went in, while the people stood without. So likewise in great national emergencies, when it became necessary "to inquire of the Lord," it was through the High Priest, and by means of the Sacred Lot, that the response was expected and given. Such at least was the original provision; in later times this office seems to have devolved, for the most part, on the Prophets; always, however, it was by "mediators."

It is obvious, therefore, as I have said that, Christianity did not give birth to the idea of a mediator between God and men; neither was it the object of Christianity to extend that idea, or the agency representing it, but rather to purify, to exalt, and, in some respects, to limit both.

I shall begin by calling your attention to the limitations here referred to, as the first step towards a truly Christian conception of the Mediatorial Office.

In the first place, while other religions acknowledge a multitude of mediators, Christianity knows but one. So in the text: "For there is one God, and one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus." Also, in another place, the same Apostle says, if possible with still more explicitness, "For though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth (as there be gods many, and lords many), but to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord, Jesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him." Accordingly, the whole scheme of mediation, so far as it had depended on a ritual worship and the ministration of men like ourselves, became essentially changed. As Neander has said: "Such a guild of priests as existed in the previous systems of religion, empowered to guide other men, who remained, as it were, in a state of religious pupilage; having the exclusive care of providing for their religious wants, and serving as mediators, by whom all other men must first be placed in connection with God and divine things; — such a priestly caste could find no place within Christianity."* Instead of the many so-called "mediators," in whom men previously trusted, the Gospel has set forth one all-sufficient Mediator, — one, because all-sufficient. We need no other, and we are not at liberty to acknowledge any other. It is not enough considered that what the text forbids by implication is just as true, and quite as important, as what it expressly asserts. It warns us not to let any man, or any body of men, or anything whatsoever, save our Lord Jesus Christ, come between the soul and its Maker. Ministers, wise and pious friends, books, religious services, early training, — all these aids to faith and piety may help to put us into the way to God, but they are not the way itself. We must not suppose that it is only by them, or through them, that we have access to the Father, or that they can bar this access to the humblest of Christ's followers.

In the second place, not only has this way of access to the Father been opened to us by one Mediator, but by him once for all. This is intimated again and again. While the old priesthoods are represented as "daily ministering, and offering oftentimes the same sacrifices," it is expressly said that "we are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ, once for all."

In order to understand the sacrificial language of the New Testament in its application to Christ, we must bear in mind that Christianity is not merely an absolute religion, that is, a religion all whose doctrines, when rightly construed, are absolutely true;

but also an historical religion. Christianity did not spring into being having no connections with the past: like every other great revolution, it has its place in history, and its historical antecedents, out of which it grew, to which it is accommodated, and without reference to which it can neither be comprehended nor explained. Historically considered, the New Testament stands related to the Old as the fulfilling of the Law, as the accomplishment of the prophecies, as the final realization of what was but "a shadow of good things to come," — the gospel of Moses became the gospel of Christ. Accordingly, almost all its doctrines and institutions, almost all its modes of religious thought and religious expression, are at bottom Jewish, with only such modifications in terms or sense, or both, as fitted them to become the exponents of a universal and spiritual dispensation. Now one of the fundamental ideas in the Hebrew ritual is, that the people are not in a condition to approach their God, without first going through a process of purification and reconciliation by means of oblations and sacrifices; and that this process is to be renewed day by day, and year by year. Such was the Jewish idea, and it reappears in the Gospel, carried out and fulfilled under a Christian form, in the doctrine that whatever was understood to be done for "a peculiar people" by the sacrifices and oblations of the Old Testament, is now done for all mankind, and once for all, by the self-sacrifice of Christ. Through his sole mediation, that is to say, by his teachings and sufferings, by his life and death, he has broken down forever the legal and ritual impediments which were thought to separate man from his Maker, and thus opened a way of access to the Father "once for all." By a new and far more sublime revelation of grace and truth, and spiritual freedom, he has opened to the whole world a door of access to the Mercy-Seat, and left it open; and, blessed be God, it is a door which no man, or body of men, can shut.

Another circumstance distinguishing Christ's mediation is, that it aims to dispense with the necessity for all further mediation, by bringing God and man together, and making them one. Our Lord's words are: "That they all may be one; as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be one in us." With the mediating priests and prophets of antiquity it was not so. What they in general undertook to do was merely to open between God and men a kind of distant communication or correspondence, by bearing to the former the offerings and requests of the latter, and bringing back the response. But Christ has done more. As the one Mediator he has opened, once for all, not only a way of communication with the Father, but a way of access to Him, — that "new and living way" by which, instead of sending, we go. It is the privilege, the distinction, the glory of Christians, that they have personal, direct, immediate access to the Father. I do not mean to deny that we owe this doctrine to Christ,—in other words, that all is through him. Nay, more, I do not mean to deny the continued presence and agency of Christ in the Church; nor that "he ever liveth to make intercession for us;"—all this, nevertheless, is not that he may still stand between God and man, in the sense of keeping them apart, but that he may bring them together, and make them one. "By whom," as our common version of the Bible renders it, "we have now received the atonement,"—that is, the at-one-ment, or the being at one.

Thus far I have spoken of obvious and striking points of difference between the Christian notion of a mediator, and the pagan or Jewish notion. But the question may here suggest itself to some minds, Why any mediator?

In answering this question, I think it neither wise nor reverent to lay much stress on arguments drawn from human conceptions of the Divine nature and government. For example: there are those who think it enough to say that God cannot forgive sin, however sincerely repented of, or receive the repentant and reclaimed sinner into favor, without a mediator; that is to say, he cannot do it freely and of his own accord. But why not? I certainly can see no reason why he could not, if he would; indeed, I cannot see any reason why he would not. All such confident assertion on the part of philosophers and theologians as to what God can do, or cannot do, resting on no better authority than their imperfect conceptions of the Divine attributes, must be extremely distasteful to serious minds; and besides, it comes, let me add, with an ill grace from those who on other occasions are among the foremost to condemn the use of reason in religion, and especially in speaking of God.

On the other hand, I can as little agree with those who think it an argument against the use and necessity of a mediator, that God is immutable and impassible, and therefore cannot be changed in his purposes respecting man by what a third person can say or do; and furthermore, that he is essentially merciful, and always ready to forgive, and therefore needs no change. For, in the first place, if we believe in the proper efficacy of prayer, we must not make God immutable and impassible in such a sense that he cannot be affected by Christ's intercessions in our behalf; and again, if we believe God to be a moral being, we must also believe him to be moved by the spectacle of Christ's sufferings. Add to this what we know of God's providence in this world. Are we not continually thanking Him for blessings, which, however, we do not receive from him directly, but through "mediators," that is, through the instrumentality of others? Accordingly, I cannot see anything unphilosophical, or improbable, or contrary to experience, in the doctrine that we are indebted for many hopes and privileges to Christ's mediation, and to the effect of this mediation on God.

Even, however, if it were not so, it would not materially affect the question at issue. You are aware that the reconciliation to be brought about by the mediation of Christ is everywhere represented in the New Testament as a reconciliation of man to God, and not of God to man. Thus it is said, "God hath reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ." And again, "For if when we were enemies we were reconciled unto God by the death of his Son, much more, being reconciled, we shall be saved by his life." The question, therefore, is not whether God needed a mediator, but whether man needed one. When the Scriptures speak of the necessity and use of Christ's mediation, it is always with reference to its benefits to mankind, and especially to mankind in the condition in which they were at his coming.

What then are some of these benefits?

It is common to mention in this connection the outward and public benefits which are to be referred to Christ, as a great Teacher and Reformer. Christianity, as I suppose all will admit, is a manifest improvement on the religions which preceded it,—an onward step in human progress. Modern civilization has grown out of it. Here, then, are great and manifest benefits in which the whole community share at this moment, believers and unbelievers. And be not misled by this statement. Some may think to argue from it, that if these benefits are now shared by unbelievers, they do not require that Christ should be accepted as a proper Mediator, and ought not, therefore, to be taken into the account. But there is a fallacy here. You might just as well say, that because the solution of a difficult problem requires no study now, having become part of the common sense of the age, it required none in the beginning. We are tracing these outward and public benefits of Christianity to their source. And, viewed in this light, is it not plain that the benefits of the institution presuppose the establishment and prevalence of the institution,—which never could have been except on condition of faith in the proper mediatorship of Christ? All, therefore, is to be looked upon as the fruit of this faith, though now enjoyed, to a certain extent, by those who reject the faith.

Consider next the inward and personal benefits resulting from the mediation of Christ, which always suppose faith in the participant. In a community nominally Christian, where all enjoy the outward and public benefits of Christianity, what advantage have those of us who believe in a Mediator over deists and sceptics who do not?

In the first place, we not only have a Teacher who approves himself to our judgment, but one who came from God, speaking to us in the name of God. Here the question is not, whether we really have a Mediator acting in this capacity, but whether it is not well to have one, and to be assured of it. I am not now discussing the evidences of Christianity; I am simply answering the inquiry, Why have a Mediator? If we had one, what would be gained thereby? Certainly it is something to know on authority what is God's will and purpose respecting us. On this point there can certainly be but one opinion. You cannot find a single serious and thoughtful unbeliever, far or near, who would not consider it a great thing to have his guesses respecting God, eternity, and the human soul turned into well-authenticated facts. Intimations are sometimes thrown out, as if the doctrine of a revelation through a Mediator, though useful and perhaps indispensable in the early ages of the world, is gradually becoming obsolete, or at least comparatively unnecessary. But it is not so. A change in relation to this matter there obviously is. What was most wanted in the beginning was information; what is most wanted now is evidence;—not that we may be saved from our errors, but from our doubts. The need, therefore, though not precisely the same, is nevertheless just as real, and just as great, now as formerly.

And this is not all. The Christian doctrine of the Mediator is, “that God was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself.” “The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us.” Unhappily the Church has taken this mystery of the incarnation, which as a mystery means a great deal, and turned it into an unintelligible dogma, which means nothing. The Bible never speaks of two natures in Christ, or of his being God and man at the same time; but it represents him again and again as being a manifestation of God,—“the brightness of his glory, and the express image of his person.” And this view, this conviction, has important practical bearings, and never more so than in the existing state of the highest human thought. It is not enough considered that we have no proper manifestation of the Living God except in Jesus Christ. We are sometimes said to see God in nature; but it is not so, even figuratively; we do not see Him there, we only see his footprints,—we see where he has been. We do not see in the material universe the Divine wisdom and goodness, we only see their effects;

but in Christ we see the qualities themselves. We see, therefore, in Christ what we worship in God; so that, without confounding them together, we can worship God in and through Christ. To some minds the distinction here insisted on may seem less unique and significant, because other men are also said in Scripture to be "made after the similitude of God." But this similitude, when applied to men in general, relates to capacities, not to attainments; to what they might become, not to what they do become. It is still as true as ever, that Christ is the only being in whom it has pleased the Father that "all fulness should dwell."

At the same time, it is this very fact, namely, that the Divine Presence is vouchsafed to us in a person of capacities like our own, which constitutes the peculiar fitness of the Christian Mediator. What do men want? Not a confounding together, not a coming together, of God and man, a meeting, if I may so express it, half-way, to be attended by the double benefit of bringing God down, so that he can be included within the scope of human sympathies, and lifting man up, so that he can become a partaker of the Divine holiness. Add to this, that by recognizing God in Christ we are naturally led to contemplate and approach the Infinite One under the aspect of his personal qualities and relations; by which we may hope that the strong pantheistic tendency of modern thought will be counteracted. Science, with the ever enlarging sweep of its generalizations, is reducing all to order and unity; and the danger is, that men will stop there, that, filled with the spirit of science, and not with the spirit of faith and love, they will fall down and worship Order and Unity; at any rate, that a vague notion of a Pantheistic Mind, or of a so-called "Soul of the Universe," may take the place of a belief in the living and true God. Hence, I insist, the necessity, and the growing necessity, of a Divine Mediator, whose very coming reveals God to us, not as the order of the universe, but as its conscious Source and Lord, — a Divine Mediator through whom this God is continually pleading with us to be reconciled to him, not merely as order and law, but as a loving Father.

One question more. Supposing it to be conceded that we need a Mediator, and such a Mediator as has been described, why also a suffering Mediator? There can be no doubt that the language used in the New Testament, and especially in the Epistle to the Hebrews, in speaking of the sacrificial import of Christ's sufferings and death, must be interpreted with a constant reference to Jewish institutions and modes of thought. Accordingly, where no regard is paid to this caution, we must expect that texts true in a literal sense will often be mixed up with texts true in a figurative sense, from which inferences will be drawn not true in any sense. Still, it is no purpose of mine to detract aught from the merit or the significance of Christ's sufferings, undergone, directly or indirectly, for our salvation.

Consider, first, their effect on the Mediator himself. "For it became Him, for whom are all things, and by whom are all things, in bringing many sons unto glory, to make the Captain of their salvation perfect through sufferings." It is a narrow and low view of the purposes of our being, which makes it a wonder, or a perplexity, that the good should suffer. In this way the good are made better; nay, it is only in this way that the great virtues of a brave endurance, and a noble self-sacrifice, can be won, or the serene and unearthly peace and joy which these virtues alone can inspire. Accordingly, in reading the narrative of the Evangelists, I think we can see evidence of our Lord's character becoming more gentle and tender and self-sacrificing under the discipline of hardship and sorrow. At any rate, we must admit the fact, for it is expressly asserted by the Apostle: he was made perfect by suffering, thereby showing that even his wonderful life is no exception to the law which makes the baptism of Christian goodness to be a baptism, not of water, but "of the Holy Spirit and of fire."

Consider, also, the moral power which the sufferings of the Mediator have given him over his followers, and over the world. We lay stress on his miracles, and Divine authority, and perfect character; and we do well, for all these are essential to the completeness of our idea of one who is to lead us to God. These give the right to reign: after all, however, it is the thought that he voluntarily bowed himself to pain, indignity, and death for our sakes, which actually enthrones him in the hearts of men. There are those who will question his miracles, demur at his authority, mock his virtues; but never one who can be made to see and enter into the nature and extent and spirit of his sufferings and sacrifices, without being touched and melted by the appeal. It is thus that "through his poverty we are made rich."

If I were to stop here, enough has already been said to vindicate the ways of God, in appointing a Mediator who can be touched by a sense of our infirmities, — "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." But I cannot help thinking that the general tenor of the New Testament teachings on this subject, and the moral and religious instincts of the human heart, go further. They testify to the fact, that heaven as well as earth is moved by the spectacle of such sufferings, endured by so holy a being, and from such love. I have nothing to do here with dogmas which have been fiercely contested in the Church. I do not say that these sufferings were necessary to make God placable; for this would seem to imply that he had been implacable before. I do not say that they are necessary to make repentance and reformation available; for it seems to me, that all justice is satisfied on sincere repentance and real reformation except vindictive justice,—the justice of retaliation or revenge. But this I say, with all reverence and humility; a compassionate God may be, and I believe is, made more compassionate still by the intercessions of such a Mediator for the frail and erring beings whom he is said, in the emphatic language of Scripture, to have redeemed, ransomed, bought by his own blood.

You may insist that this whole subject is involved in mystery, and that you are tired of mystery. But you cannot get rid of mystery, even if you would; it attaches to every point of the higher life in man; life itself is a mystery, and death a still greater mystery. And besides, do not object to mystery from confounding it with what is not mystery. A mystery, as that term is here used, is not an unintelligible proposition, or a proposition of any kind. It is a fact comprehended but in part,—half understood, and half not understood. That part which we cannot understand, we leave with the secret things which belong to the Lord our God; that part which we can understand we use for instruction and edification; and it teaches us in this case, "that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them; and hath committed unto us the word of reconciliation. Now then we are ambassadors for Christ; as though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead, be ye reconciled to God."

THE EVERLASTING GOSPEL.

UPON THIS ROCK I WILL BUILD MY CHURCH; AND THE GATES OF HELL SHALL NOT PREVAIL AGAINST IT. — Matthew xvi. 18.

VICISSITUDE, we often say, and with the daily proof of it before our eyes, is stamped on all earthly things. Is it so with Christianity? Customs and institutions, dynasties and nations, systems of government, systems of philosophy, and systems of religion, have passed away, or are passing away. Have we any reason to believe, or to fear, that Christianity must also submit to the same law?

This is not a new question. John the Baptist, having been left to languish in prison for several months, sent two of his disciples to Jesus with the inquiry, "Art thou He that should come, or do we look for another?" A momentary cloud of despondency would seem to have passed over the mind of our Lord himself when he said, "Nevertheless, when the Son of Man cometh, shall he find faith on the earth?" And so with many of his sincere followers in all ages. They have not begun by doubting the Divine origin of Christianity, or its essential reasonableness, or its moral beauty and sublimity, or its unspeakable importance in a practical point of view. Their distrust, their misgivings, have had another origin. They have looked — and, as they thought, in vain, or almost in vain — for the promised and expected fruit. Nearly two thousand years have elapsed since angelic voices chanted the hymn: “Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men.” A cry was also heard: “Repent, for the kingdom of Heaven is at hand.” Nearly two thousand years, — a long period, even for the unfolding of such issues; yet what do we see. Is the promise fulfilled? Is the prophecy accomplished? Individuals, no doubt, can here and there be found, who are penetrated and filled with the Christian spirit; but when we look at society at large, when we look at what is called the Christian world, where is the nation, where is the community, where is the party or the sect, which as a whole, or even generally, is Christian except in name? Can we wonder, then, that good men, discouraged and disheartened by the slow progress of things, and by the ill success of many a well-devised plan of improvement or reform, should sometimes be tempted to fear that Christianity itself, at least in much that was expected from it, may turn out a failure, — in short, that it has had its day?

The common argument to prove the groundlessness of this fear may be stated in a few words. Christianity is the truth, and truth is indestructible; nay, as knowledge increases, all minds must by necessity gravitate towards it. Moreover, Christianity is of Divine origin, and is founded on miracles. We must presume, therefore, that the same Almighty Being who founded it will continue to uphold it, even though miracles should again be necessary for that purpose; especially as we have express assurance in the text to the same effect: "Upon this Rock I will build my Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

Now it is no part of my plan to call in question the soundness of this argument; much less, that of the conclusion to which it leads. Still there are two considerations which make it proper not to rest in this argument, but to pursue the investigation a little further.

In the first place, what is here said of Christianity may also be said, with little or no abatement, of Judaism. Judaism is understood to be of Divine origin, and, in so far as it is so, the truth. Moreover, the old revelation is understood to be founded on miracles, as well as the new; and the promise that it should be perpetual is quite as explicit, and more frequent. Thus, to Abraham: "And I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee; and I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, and all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession." This promise is renewed again and again to Moses and Aaron, and afterwards by the mouth of the prophets, in such words as these: "Thy people also shall be all righteous; they shall inherit the land forever." And again: "The Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion from henceforth, even forever." I am aware of the turn given to these passages by the commentators. They say, and no doubt truly, that this promise was made with a tacit understanding, with an implied condition; namely, that the Jews should be faithful on their part. The promise, therefore, has not been broken; for though it has failed, it has been through the unfaithfulness of the Jews. Be it so. Why then may not the same thing happen in respect to Christianity? God, of course, will not break any of his promises; nevertheless, may not the promise of perpetuity fail under the new covenant, as we know it did under the old, and for the same reason,—because an implied condition has not been fulfilled, or, in other words, through the unfaithfulness of Christians?

A second reason for not resting content with the

'bare statement of the argument, as given above, is found in the natural desire to strengthen and fortify our faith, though founded on acknowledged Divine authority, by proofs and illustrations drawn from other sources. How many sermons have been preached to Christian congregations in order to convince men of the efficacy of prayer, or of a life to come! Yet all know that both these doctrines are expressly taught in the Scriptures; and all believe, or profess to believe, that the Scriptures are the Word of God. In such cases we are far from thinking that faith can be dispensed with; in respect to many things we must "walk by faith, not by sight," and the more entire and unreserved this faith, the better. Still, it unquestionably gives new force and vivacity to what we believe on authority, even though it be on the highest authority, if we can be made to see that what we thus believe on authority falls in also with what we know, by our own reason and experience. As regards practical effect, quite as much depends on its seeming to be a fact, as on our believing it to be a fact; on its verisimilitude, as on its truth.

It is, therefore, from no distrust of the authority of Scripture, but for other reasons, that we would push the inquiry a little further, and ask whether there is not something in the very nature of Christianity, and peculiar to it, to reassure us that it will never be destroyed by the prevalence of irreligion, nor supplanted by any other religion purporting to be truer or more Divine.

In the first place, if we attentively consider the essential nature of Christianity, we can hardly fail to be struck with one remarkable peculiarity. Unlike every other historical and authoritative religion, not excepting Judaism, it is neither a political constitution, nor a prescribed ritual, nor a doctrinal system, nor a code of laws; but a body of principles, to act as the unfolding germs of a higher type of moral and spiritual life. Neither the purpose nor the tendency of these principles is to arrest society at any stage of its progress, but rather to help on that progress indefinitely, — partaking of the progress themselves, inasmuch as, though the principles remain the same, they will be better and better understood, and more and more wisely applied.

Let me explain what I mean; and first, as regards worship, including all those duties and hopes which spring out of our immediate relations to God, and our direct intercourse with Him. You know how it was, in this respect, with the great historical religions which preceded Christianity, — the religions of India, of Egypt, of Greece, of Rome. Each consisted, for the most part, of an outward ceremonial, the details of which were appointed and regulated to the minutest particular by law or custom, and any departure therefrom, whether consciously or unconsciously, was looked upon as more likely than anything else to incense the gods. Were their armies routed and slain by the enemy, was there evil in the city, was there famine or pestilence, the excited imagination of the people was almost sure to charge it upon some change or some neglect in the sacred rites. The same is true to a considerable extent of Judaism, as every one must see on turning over the pages of the Levitical code; neither is it any objection to a religion intended to be preparatory, and therefore to pass away, or be superseded by another. But in the New Testament an essentially different view of worship is inculcated. "Jesus saith unto her, Woman, believe me, the hour cometh when ye shall neither in this mountain, nor yet at Jerusalem, worship the Father. Ye worship ye know not what: we know what we worship; for salvation is of the Jews. But the hour cometh, and now is, when the true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and in truth: for the Father seeketh such to worship him. God is a spirit; and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and in truth." Accordingly, the triumph of Christianity is not to be regarded merely as the triumph of one ritual over another ritual; it is the triumph of religion over all rituals, except in so far as one or another may be thought useful for the decencies and conveniences of worship in a particular church. Under Christianity, the place, the time, the outward form, are nothing in themselves considered; it is enough if the worship is true and spiritual, these words to be interpreted according to the highest conceptions of the true and the spiritual that shall, at any time, have been attained.

Turning next to the ethical, as distinguished from the devotional, element in Christianity, the same peculiarity reappears. In the primitive and preparatory religions, morality is taught almost exclusively, when it is taught at all, in the form of certain outward actions enjoined, and certain other outward actions forbidden. The morality of the Mosaic dispensation, an admirable summary of which is given in the Ten Commandments, is of this kind. Scarcely a word is said in that compend about inward principles and dispositions, or about virtues and vices, as such; but the people are expressly told what to do, and what not to do;—doubtless the best and only practicable course to be taken in a rude age. In the more spiritual tone of the later prophets we behold the morning twilight of a better day; which they foretold, and to some extent anticipated, as one when God would “put his law in men’s inward parts, and write it on their hearts.” And that day has come. Of course you will understand me to speak in this connection of Christian morality; — not of the actual morality of Christians, but of what the morality of Christians ought to be according to the Gospel.

A glance at the Sermon on the Mount, and especially at the Beatitudes in which the doctrine and spirit of that sermon is summed up, must convince every unprejudiced mind, that we have here, not merely a higher cast and style of morality than had been hitherto known, but also an essentially different manner of moral inculcation. The stress is no longer laid, as before, on the outward act, or the specific and arbitrary rule, but on the purpose, the intention, the thought. The outward action is still as important as ever; but it is so, in a moral point of view, merely because it expresses or involves some good or bad inward principle or disposition. Accordingly, under the Gospel, the moral injunction is laid directly on the inward principle or disposition: in other words, it is not said, as it was “to them of old time,” “Thou shalt not steal,” “Thou shalt not kill,” “Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor;” but rather, “Blessed are the meek,” “Blessed are the merciful,” “Blessed are the pure in heart.” The inward principle or disposition is insisted on, and each individual is expected and required to manifest the same in such manner as the highest moral and spiritual culture for the time being may dictate or approve. The merciful man of to-day may live up to a higher conception of what mercy means and includes, than the merciful man of five centuries ago; still he is but a merciful man after all; he does no more than what is required; he does not, and he cannot, transcend or outgrow the Christian rule.

Thus does Christianity, as regards both worship and obedience, link itself to the great law of human progress, and partake of that progress. No real or possible growth of society and the human mind can ever have the effect to outgrow Christianity, inasmuch as the actual Christianity will grow along with it. I do not mean that Christianity, considered in itself, can ever differ from what it is, or from what it was in the beginning; but the actual Christianity may, — nay, must, in proportion as men understand its principles better, and enter more entirely into its spirit.

We shall also arrive at the same general conclusion, if, instead of considering the kind of piety and righteousness inculcated in the New Testament, we look at the Example we are to follow, or at the great practical authority which makes imitation of that example binding on the soul.

Cicero's complaint respecting the founders of pagan systems of religion and philosophy is well known. "Who is there among them all," he asks, “ whose practical principles, temper, and conduct were conformable to right reason? Who ever regarded his philosophy as a law and rule of life, and not rather as an ostentation of his ability and learning? Who ever obeyed his own instructions, and made his precepts the model of his own daily practice?” But with Christ it is not so, infidels themselves being the judges. By universal consent his doctrine and life are one. His character was a living impersonation of what he taught, thus becoming of the nature of a new and supplementary revelation, because it shows how the various Christian graces should exist and act together, qualifying each other, balancing each other, complementing and perfecting each other. The need of some such authenticated pattern or presentation of the character required, not in its separate ingredients but as a whole, was felt long before the coming of Christ; and the Stoics thought to supply it by the fiction of what they called their Sage or Wise Man. But this well-meant expedient failed in two obvious particulars. In the first place, their Wise Man was not a reality, having authority over them, but a fiction constructed by themselves; and secondly, as it was nothing more than a fanciful embodiment of the doctrines of a particular sect in a particular age, it was sure to pass away with the age and sect which gave it birth. And so it did.

Widely different is it with the character of Christ, — the living, the absolute, the Divine pattern and standard set forth in the Gospel. This might be illustrated in a thousand ways; but the point of distinction to which alone I wish to call your attention now is, that the great Christian Exemplar can never become obsolete, can never lose either its use or its authority.

It is to no purpose to say that the character of Christ is what it is; that it represents a fixed quantity, a stationary object, while society and the human mind are constantly moving on. You might just as well say the same of Nature. You might just as well say that Nature is what it is; that it represents a fixed quantity, a stationary object, while society and the human mind are constantly moving on. But does Nature ever become obsolete? What become obsolete are men's views of Nature; and these become so, only because they are superseded and displaced by juster and more profound views. So it is with the character of Christ.

What more perhaps than anything else distinguishes the believing and earnest man of all times is his aspiration after an ideal good, an inextinguishable longing to realize his conception of the highest and the best. Now one of the purposes and one of the effects of the moral character exhibited in the life of Jesus is to help such persons not merely to realize this conception, but also to elevate and purify the conception itself, inspiring them with the idea of a higher highest, and of a better best, than they could have unfolded from their own minds, or from any merely verbal description. And this is not all. Though in a much nobler sense, and to much more exalted issues, it is the same with the study of the Christian model of holiness as with the study of the finest models in art. Not only are susceptible minds excited and instructed by the first impression of the model, but by the continual study of it, by a growing familiarity and sympathy with it, they are able to see more and more in the model itself. In this way the example of Christ, as well as his teachings, his life as well as his word, becomes not merely a perpetual revelation, but a perpetually progressive revelation, forever keeping pace with the progressive receptivities of those to whom it is addressed. Let the world grow as much wiser as it may, the wisest and best men in it will always be among the foremost to acknowledge, that "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, has shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

Meanwhile, and for the same reason, the moral, the practical authority, of the Gospel, the authority which gives effect to the whole, must also be on the increase, and not on the decline.

When men refer to the authority on which Christianity rests, I believe they commonly mean its historical authority, the authority of the record as a genuine and trustworthy narrative of what actually took place eighteen and a half centuries ago. Restricting themselves to this narrow and unspiritual view of authority in things heavenly and Divine, we need not wonder if they should sometimes fall into the error of supposing that this authority must gradually, and in the lapse of ages, lose its hold on the human mind. One writer,* and he neither an enemy nor a sceptic, has gone so far as to make this process a matter of mathematical calculation, his conclusion being that the probability of the New Testament narrative will entirely cease at the end of 3,150 years, reckoning from the birth of Christ; and consequently, that this will be the epoch when the Son of God will come to judge the world, because then, according to Luke, chap. viii, ver. 8, there will be no more faith on the earth. Let such vagaries pass for what they are worth. I do not shut my eyes on the importance and necessity of the historical authority of Christianity; neither am I under any apprehensions that it will ever fail; but this I say, unless sustained, or at least concurred in, by the moral and practical authority, it would not, it could not stand. If the monkish legends of the Middle Ages, if the coarse and vulgar pretences to the supernatural in our own day, are urged upon us as entitled to credence, because supported by a greater amount of historical evidence than can be adduced in proof of some of the Christian miracles, my answer is, in the words of Locke, the praise of whose humble faith and sobriety of judgment is in everybody's mouth: "The miracles are to be judged by the doctrine, and not the doctrine by the miracles."*

So far as our faith in revelation depends on tradition alone, whether oral or written, there can be no doubt, I suppose, that time must do something to wear away its freshness and vitality. But nothing hinders this loss from being made up, and more than made up, in other ways;—in the case of Christianity, by the fulfilment of prophecy, by continued opportunity to submit its claims to a practical test, by its triumphs, by its fruits. In order to excuse our own doubts and misgivings we are apt to over-estimate the advantages which the early converts had over us, and to under-estimate the advantages which we have over them, as regards the Christian evidences. When the apostles were arraigned before the Council at Jerusalem, you remember the ground taken by Gamaliel, "a doctor of the law, had in reputation among all the people":

“And now I say unto you, Refrain from these men, and let them alone; for if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to naught, but if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it.” Strange as it may seem, he does not appear to have been much affected, one way or another, by what had already taken place: he makes everything turn on the question, Will it stand? Now it has stood. More than that; whatever we may say or think about its inward triumphs, its outward triumphs are unquestioned and complete. At this very moment the whole civilized world are glorifying the advent of the Son of Mary,—of Him, who while upon earth knew not where to lay his head, the Crucified One. Who does not perceive that the men of that day, Jews and Gentiles, would have poured into the Church by thousands and tens of thousands, if they had foreseen, if they had even so much as suspected, what we know?

After all, however, the faith which is built on any form of external evidence, is a faith of the understanding, and not necessarily of the heart; a faith, moreover, which a man of a base heart may attain, his heart remaining unchanged. What we want is a living and saving faith in Christianity, which consists, not in believing or knowing that the Gospel is true, but in feeling the force of the truths which the Gospel teaches; and this cannot be, until our hearts are brought into communion and sympathy with them; and this, again, is the work, not of books on the evidences, but of Christian nurture. What is true of God in Nature, is true also of God in History and God in Christ;—to apprehend Divinity anywhere, in anything, so as to be vitally affected thereby, we must first be put into communication with it, through the development of what is divine in our own souls. Did our Lord mean nothing when he said: “My doctrine is not mine, but His that sent me; if any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself”? Does any one suppose that holy and devout men, men who know Christianity from the life and have made great progress in that life, ask for any better evidence of its truth than they can find in themselves? Whence then this modern conceit, that we are growing so wise and good as to be in danger of outgrowing Christianity? Undoubtedly there is a culture of the understanding and of the taste, which will make a great scholar, or a great artist, or a great man of business, without bringing him any nearer to the kingdom of God; but it is because the culture is limited and one-sided. Make it to be the culture of the whole man, and the higher the culture, the stronger and the purer the faith.

If these things are so, it follows incontestably that Christianity is not a passing phase of society, a religion very well for its time, a single stage in human progress, which, like every other such stage, must have its beginning, its middle, and its end. It is "an everlasting possession." This I have shown to follow from the fact that Christianity is true and Divine, and from the express teaching of Scripture. But I have not stopped there. I have also shown it to follow from the nature of the religion itself, and from the character of its Founder, and from the adjustment of both to the essential and indestructible needs and capacities of the human soul. In proportion as Christianity educates men up to a level with its own teachings, they will find the witness in themselves. The deep intuitions of our spiritual nature, once awakened by the Gospel, will shine in their own light, and shine on forever.

Jesus of Nazareth is looked up to, not as the head of a new school in philosophy, not as the founder of a new dynasty, or a new state, but as the Father of a New Age. Modern civilization is built on the great movement which he began; and this civilization would be shaken to its base, would tumble into ruins, were faith in Him to fail. But it never will. We may wonder at the slow progress of things; but it is because they are in the hands of Him with whom "one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day." We may wonder at the errors and follies, at the divisions and strifes which have prevailed, and still prevail among Christians; but to say that all this struggle between good and evil, between light and darkness, is to end in nothing, would be worse than a belief in atheism; it would be atheism acted out. Everywhere, and over all is heard that voice at which the storms were hushed, and the dead raised: "Upon this rock I will build my Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away."

THE SCHOLAR AMONG THE APOSTLES.

I AM VERILY A MAN WHICH AM A JEW, BORN IN TARSUS, A CITY IN CILICIA, YET BROUGHT UP IN THIS CITY, AT THE FEET OF GAMALIEL, AND TAUGHT ACCORDING TO THE PERFECT MANNER OF THE LAW OF THE FATHERS.—Acts xxii. 3.

PAUL was the only one among the Apostles who can be said to have enjoyed the advantages of a liberal education, or to have moved before his conversion in the higher walks of life. I propose to consider the influence of this circumstance on his character, teachings, and success.

Let me begin, however, by observing, that I entertain no disparaging views either of the social or intellectual condition of the rest of the Apostles. Though they cannot be said to have been learned, in the sense of being scholars, like Paul, there is no ground for supposing that they were especially rude, ignorant, or even illiterate. They were not taken from the lowest class in society; in that case they would have had too much to learn: nor yet, from the highest class; in that case they would have had too much to unlearn. In common with a large proportion of the first Christian teachers, they were taken from the middle class; where almost all great moral revolutions have begun, as Protestantism in Germany, and Puritanism in England, and where such revolutions, for obvious reasons, must always be expected to begin.

Let me also, before going any further, anticipate a general objection to the very aim of this discourse, which may possibly occur to some minds. It may be thought that in making Paul's conduct in his apostleship to be modified or determined in any way by his previous culture, I forget, or virtually deny, that he was inspired. The Apostles may have differed, as other men do, in their natural and acquired tastes and abilities; still it may be thought that these differences could not have affected them as apostles, certainly not in their teachings, inasmuch as they all "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

In reply to this I hasten to say, that nothing is further from my purpose than to call in question the inspiration of the sacred writers, or to seek to resolve that inspiration into natural causes. I assume that they were divinely appointed, and divinely illuminated, in order to become infallible guides as to what is essential or important to Christianity. But we are not to suppose that inspiration annihilates personality, or differences of personal endowment, even as regards teaching. In fact, we know better. We cannot open the New Testament, at any rate we cannot peruse it with the smallest measure of discrimination, without perceiving that Matthew did not write like John, and that neither Matthew nor John wrote like Paul. From this we do not infer that all of them, or any of them, were uninspired men. We believe them all to have been supernaturally enlightened, and to have thus had before them a true conception of the religion they were to teach. Still in the act of teaching it, we believe, or rather we cannot help seeing, that one insists on one topic and another on another, that one illustrates the same truth in one way and another in another, that one considers it in one connection and another in another, according to the particular purpose he has in view, or his peculiar bent of mind, or his skill, or his want of skill, as a writer.

I return, then, to a consideration of Paul's condition in life and early training, and the influence they appear to have had on his conduct and success.

Though of Hebrew descent, he was born at Tarsus, in Cilicia, — “a citizen of no mean city.” Strabo, a contemporary of Paul, says of the inhabitants of this place, who were mostly Greeks, that they “cherish such a passion for philosophy, and all the various branches of polite letters, as greatly to excel Athens and Alexandria, and every other place in which there are schools and academies of philosophy and erudition. But Tarsus differs in this; those who here devote themselves to the study of literature are natives of the country; not many come from foreign parts. Nor do the natives of the country continue here for life, but they go abroad to finish their studies, and when they have perfected themselves, they choose to live in other places: there are but few who return home.”* The course pursued by Paul illustrates in a striking manner these statements of the old geographer. The first years of his life were passed in his native city, where he could not fail to profit by the facilities he enjoyed to become acquainted with Greek society, Greek literature and the Greek mind. His condition in life was evidently such as to bring these advantages within his reach; for he says expressly that he was “born” a Roman citizen,—a distinction his family is supposed to have obtained by purchase at an exorbitant price, or else as the reward of important public service: in either case it argues a family of consideration. Moreover, to have coveted such a distinction, the privileges of Roman citizenship, argues a family not shut up within the narrow bounds of Jewish prejudice.

* Geographica, Lib. xiv. Cap. X. 13.

However this may be, it is certain that in due time, and before attaining to manhood, Paul followed the practice which Strabo says was so common with the students of Tarsus, he went abroad to complete his education. As "a Hebrew of the Hebrews," as "a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee," he repaired, of course, to Jerusalem, still the centre of Hebrew tradition and Hebrew learning; where he joined the school of Gamaliel, the most distinguished at that time among the doctors of his nation, and was brought up at his feet, being "taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers." Here, his proficiency and zeal were such as to attract the attention of the leading men at Jerusalem; so much so, that they did not hesitate to intrust him, soon afterwards, young as he yet was, with commissions which they must have known required not a little of resolution and address. Accordingly he says on one occasion: "I profited in the Jews' religion above many mine equals in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions." And again: "I persecuted this way unto the death, binding and delivering into prisons both men and women; as also the High Priest doth bear me witness, and all the estate of the elders: from whom also I received letters unto the brethren, and went to Damascus, to bring them which were there bound unto Jerusalem, to be punished."

Some have wondered that Paul, after having had his mind enlarged and liberalized by study, — especially under such a teacher as Gamaliel, who appears to have counselled moderation and forbearance in respect to the new religion, — should have become so unwearied and relentless a persecutor of the Church. But they forget two things. In the first place, they forget that a spirit of moderation, is generally much more a matter of temperament, than of instruction or education. Again, they forget that persecution is of two kinds: some persecuting from policy, because their craft is in danger; others from an honest dread of what they believe to be pernicious error, — because they think that religion, morality, order, the best interests of mankind, are in danger. I am aware that, in practice, we seldom meet with either of these two kinds of persecution wholly unmixed with the other; still history affords some examples, — for instance, that of Sir Thomas More, — where the latter kind, which we may call conscientious persecution, was comparatively pure. And so with Paul; for he tells us, after his conversion, “I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth.” We also have the evidence of his after life to the same effect. The moment he was convinced that the new doctrine was from God, his love of truth showed itself to be stronger than his prejudices, or his party ties, or his worldly ambition; and from being the persecutor of Christianity, he became the most active and successful of its advocates and missionaries. I do not make these distinctions in order to justify the conduct of Paul, while a Jew; he never thought to justify, or even to excuse it, to himself;—but simply to set it in its true light. It did not spring, like most persecution, from an essentially bad principle, but from the perversion of an essentially good principle;—a perversion, moreover, to which a young and ardent scholar, fresh from his studies, and burning with desire to signalize his zeal for what he had been taught, was peculiarly liable.

All are familiar with the miraculous circumstances which attended the conversion of Paul, while on his way to Damascus, and also with the fact, just intimated, that he “was not disobedient to the heavenly vision.” And here it is difficult, if not impossible, to avoid the conclusion, that the preparation of Paul up to this time had been by the special ordering of Divine Providence; for an exigency had now arisen, calling for precisely such a man, with precisely such a training. As he was to be the great Apostle to the Gentiles, as he was to form the connecting link between the Jewish and pagan worlds, it was necessary that his education should be such as to make him acquainted with Jewish and pagan habits of life and thought, in order that he might be in a condition to understand and do justice to both.

First of all, we see the fruit of this culture in the thoughtfulness and deliberation with which he entered on his labors. Had Paul been an ignorant man, or even what is called a self-educated man, he would probably have deemed himself competent at once to the undertaking; as it was, he had the diffidence which belongs to men of large and comprehensive views. Accordingly his first step was to retire into Arabia, where he passed three years in comparative seclusion; being occupied, for the most part, as we may presume, in adjusting his mind to his new experiences and his new conceptions of truth, in maturing his plans and deepening the foundations of his own faith and piety. It was this earnest self-discipline, in conjunction with the cosmopolite character of his previous training, more perhaps than anything else, his miraculous powers excepted, which qualified him so eminently to become an Apostle to the Gentiles. His subsequent conduct testifies to this truth. Among all nations, from the most civilized to the most barbarous, with all people, from the most enlightened to the most ignorant,—among the wandering hordes of Arabia, in the beautiful country of Asia Minor, amidst the bleak and barren mountains of Thrace, with the sceptical and philosophizing Athenians, with the corrupt and effeminate Corinthians, in the Eternal City, in Spain, even among the poor and superstitious islanders of Malta,—there was scarcely a discovered spot on the face of the globe, where we do not find the footprints of this unwearied apostle, everywhere at home, everywhere prepared with views and arguments adapted to the habits and capacities of the people he addressed, everywhere preaching “Jesus and the resurrection,” and becoming all things to all men, that he might at least save some.

We also see traces of Paul’s scholarship, and general refinement of thought and manner, in his teaching; and especially in his style of address, where rude, but well-meaning, reformers are so apt to fail. He carefully abstains, as has just been hinted, from giving unnecessary offence. As far as compatible with conscience and his leading objects, he always seeks to accommodate himself to the customs and prejudices of the persons addressed, combining in a remarkable manner the severe independence and uncompromising purpose of a confessor and martyr with the adroitness, and oftentimes with the ease and urbanity, of a man of the world. Witness the exordium of his celebrated defence before Agrippa. “Then Paul stretched forth his hand and answered for himself. I think myself happy, King

Agrippa, because I shall answer for myself this day before thee, touching all the things whereof I am accused of the Jews; especially because I know thee to be expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews: wherefore I beseech thee to hear me patiently." And, above all, in the noble burst of eloquence at the close of that discourse. "Then Agrippa said unto Paul, 'Almost thou persuadedst me to be a Christian.' And Paul said, 'I would to God, that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost, and altogether such as I am, except these bonds.'" Witness, also, his address to the Athenians. It appears that Paul, as his custom was, had been preaching "Jesus and the Resurrection," and this, by a natural misconception on the part of polytheists, had been construed into an unauthorized "setting forth of strange gods," which the laws forbade under penalty of death. Hence one of his objects was to undeceive them in this respect, and to do it in a manner which should be true in itself, and, at the same time, intelligible from their point of view. Mark how admirably he succeeds. "Then Paul stood in the midst of Areopagus, and said: 'Ye men of Athens, I perceive you altogether much given to religious worship. For as I passed by and beheld your devotions, I found, among others, an altar with this inscription, To the Unknown God. Whom, therefore, without knowing, ye worship, Him declare I unto you.'” I have no wish to exaggerate the literary merits of the sacred writers, or to put what they have done on a level, in this respect, with the great masterpieces of genius and art: nevertheless I do not wonder, that, in a fragment ascribed by some to Longinus, Paul of Tarsus is numbered among the celebrated orators of Greece.

Again, we see the influence of Paul's intellectual training and activity, in the logical form which the Christian doctrine took under his hand. The other writers of the New Testament look chiefly to practical wants; Paul alone represents the logical or purely intellectual want of the Church; and he represents it, because he alone, from his previous mental training and habits of thought, was likely to feel it. The other writers of the New Testament were content to give a religion to the world; he aspired to give a theology, that is, a philosophy of religion,—not only what is to be believed, but the reason why it is to be believed, and its connections with other truths, and especially with what is known of the human and Divine natures. I am aware that some persons are half-inclined to regret, that so early an example was set in the Church of an attempt to make the Gospel assume a logical or scientific form. While we have but one religion, they will tell you, that we have a multitude of theologies; that these theologies have only had the effect to distract and obstruct the religion; and that the Pauline theology was the first, and led the way to others, or at least to varieties of itself. But all such regrets are vain. A scientific spirit, a passion for comprehending things, and putting all knowledge in harmony with itself, in one word, logical thinking, with all its consequences for weal or woe, is a necessity to some minds. Very probably the majority of Christians would be content with the devotional and practical portions of the New Testament. But this to the Augustines and Luthers of all ages is "milk for babes"; they turn to the Epistle to the Romans and the Epistle to the Galatians, as the "strong meat for men." John was "the disciple whom Jesus loved": Paul is known by another distinction, which, in the view of many, is hardly less honorable,—he was the great thinker in the Primitive Church. From these personal differences we do not infer that the Gospel according to Paul differed from the Gospel according to John in substance, but only in form; and it was doubtless best that among those who were authorized to give a form, or, rather, some of its various possible forms, to the Gospel, every type of the human mind and character should find its representative.

We find still further traces of Paul's large and generous culture in what may be called the spirit of his teaching. A large proportion of the intolerance and uncharitableness among Christians originates in narrow views. Enlarge men's minds, and you do not a little towards enlarging their policy, and sometimes even their hearts. Of this we have more than one illustration in the Apostle Paul;— in the readiness with which he gave up his Jewish repugnance to admit the Gentiles into the Church; in the magnificent eulogium on charity in his First Epistle to the Corinthians; and in the candor and liberality which he recommends in the treatment of weak brethren. “Him that is weak in the faith receive ye, but not to doubtful disputations. One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind. I know, and am persuaded by the Lord Jesus, that there is nothing unclean of itself; but to him that esteemeth anything unclean, to him it is unclean. We then that are strong, ought to bear the infirmities of the weak, and not to please ourselves.” This, certainly, is the language of one, whom the study of men, as well as of books, has imbued not only with the love of wisdom, but with the wisdom of love. Hence in all the differences which grew up among the first Christians, we find Paul on the liberal side. He knew how endless and profitless were most of the contentions which divide and estrange mankind. He knew, too, that neither righteousness nor piety was confined to one place, or one party, or one creed. For he had travelled the world over; he had seen men under every variety of climate and government and religion, and he had found good men everywhere, and bad men everywhere. He felt, moreover, for his whole race, knowing that he shared with them a common frailty, and they with him a common hope; that there was one Father over all, who could not but love all his children.

One remark more, which may be regarded as the application of the whole subject. The education and social position of Paul give new force to the argument for the truth of Christianity drawn from his conversion. We have dwelt on the education and social position of Paul, not for the purpose of proving that he was a good man, or an inspired man, for they prove neither; but as evidence that he was raised above many popular errors, and not likely to be carried away by a mere popular excitement. With the rest of the Apostles it was not so; much enlargement of mind, or much knowledge of the world and its ways, was hardly, of course, to be expected in persons of their condition in life. Accordingly, had they alone, and such as they, been wrought upon, it would, no doubt, have been pretended that a little enthusiasm or a little craft was quite sufficient to account for the success of the delusion. But in Paul we have a man not so easily to be deceived and misled,—a man whose mind had been informed and enlarged by liberal studies and foreign travel,—a man who could reason with philosophers, and at whose eloquence kings trembled,—a man of whom Festus said, “Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad.”

If we ever doubt the historical truth of our religion, I believe it is, generally, because we think that if we had lived at the time, and on the spot, we should have been able to detect some flaw in the evidence. But what right have we to think we could have done this, when we find it was not done by Paul? Have we any more penetration than he had, or more knowledge of the world, or of the weaknesses and perversities of human nature? Are we any more elevated than he was, by birth, education, and standing in society, above the delusions and credulities of the popular mind? Should we have been any more likely than he was to suspect fanaticism or hypocrisy, or to detect pious frauds? To all these questions we must answer, No. Yet this man, living at the time and on the spot, was converted; this man, from being a conscientious and thoroughly instructed Jew, became a Christian; this man, from being an enemy and persecutor of the new faith, became its most active and zealous advocate and missionary; this man, who, to all outward appearance, had everything to lose, and nothing to gain by changing his religion, changed it, nevertheless, on conviction, and lived and died in that conviction.

There is a tradition in the Church, that Paul was beheaded near Rome, and buried about two miles from the city, on the Ostian Road. A magnificent cathedral, dedicated to his memory, was built over his grave by Constantine; but his noblest monument is found in the churches which he planted, and, above all, in his immortal writings which "are read of all men." How instructive is this lesson from history! for it shows that the most enduring fame is to be found in the ways of the highest duty. If Paul had denied or stifled his conscience, if he had thought only of ease and present reputation, he might doubtless have taken his place among the most distinguished rabbis of his nation; but who would have cared for him now? His glory is this, that he devoted his talents and learning and life to the service of truth and the good of mankind,—a glory as imperishable as the objects for which he labored.

THE ALLEGED INFIDELITY OF GREAT MEN.

HAVE ANY OF THE RULERS, OR OF THE PHARISEES, BELIEVED ON HIM?—John vii. 48.

WE sometimes hear insinuations thrown out against a belief in Christianity, as if it were a weakness, to which men of strong minds, especially if also men of science or men of the world, must by necessity be superior. Let this opinion prevail among the educated and ambitious classes, and there is an end to all hope that they will ever be deeply and seriously affected by the Gospel. They may find it prudent or convenient to pay an outward respect to it, as the religion of the country; they may even do so from a sincere regard to the best interests of the community; but that they should be deeply and seriously affected by it in their own hearts, while entertaining such views, is out of the question.

The friends of religion, from their jealousy of human learning and worldly distinctions, are sometimes betrayed into language tending to the same effect. I am aware that, in the latter case, when infidelity and irreligion are charged upon great men, it is with a view to detract from the great men, and not from the religion of which they have shown themselves unworthy. Still, if the topic is frequently returned to, and dwelt upon, without making the proper discriminations, it will insensibly give rise, at least in most minds, to the prejudice above mentioned. They will begin to suspect that as knowledge advances faith recedes; and, on the strength of this suspicion, their own faith will begin to recede. Ostensibly it may not take the form of an objection to the Gospel, but it will do the work of an objection; or, worse still, it will act as a secret, undefined, half-unconscious misgiving.

For this reason I propose to take up and examine the alleged infidelity and irreligion of great men. How far is this charge well-founded? and as far as well founded, what does it signify?

Reasoning from general considerations alone, it would be easy to show that there is no incompatibility between religion and true greatness.

Thus I might show, in the first place, that the very preparation of mind necessary to make it fully alive to the satisfactions, or even to the evidences of spiritual truth, must also have a tendency to refine, liberalize and enlarge the mind itself. I might show, in the second place, that the leading subjects of contemplation which religion brings into notice, are of such a nature that they cannot fail to communicate something of their own weight and dignity to the mind that is familiar with them. I might show, in the third place, that the feelings and dispositions, the purposes and aspirations, which religion excites and calls forth, are among the noblest properties of the soul, and as far as possible removed from all that is low, or mean, or ordinary. I might show, in the fourth place, that in a multitude of instances the direct influence of religious principle has been to lead men to acts of magnanimity and heroism, which have never been exceeded. And lastly, I might show, that the most illustrious names in history, the brightest ornaments of society and greatest benefactors of mankind, infidels themselves being judges, have been found among those who looked to religion as the source of their highest as well as purest inspirations, and considered themselves as never more truly great, than when in the act of acknowledging God as their infinite and loving Father.

But general reasonings of this kind meet the difficulty under consideration only half way. They prove indeed that there is no incompatibility between true religion and real greatness; and furthermore, that many great men have been humble and devout believers. Still the original charge may stand, to this extent at least, that the proportion of great men who have been infidels or sceptics, is larger than that of men in ordinary life.

Is it so, however, in point of fact?

Great men are either great actors, or great thinkers; they are seldom both. Now when great men are said to be sceptically inclined, I suppose the great men intended are the great thinkers: first, because they are the only great men who are likely to intermeddle with the difficult and perplexing questions at issue; and secondly, because they are the only great men whose judgment in such matters is of sufficient importance to be referred to.

The charge, then, is against the great thinkers; but, considered as made against them, several reasons may be suggested, which should make us slow to entertain it.

Great thinkers must be presumed to be sometimes in advance of the world in their thinking; else why are they called great thinkers. Merely to be able to defend by a subtle and refined logic a foregone conclusion argues ingenuity, it is true, but not the much higher faculty, that of original thought. Now everybody knows that a considerable departure from the popular faith, though it is merely by being in advance of it, is apt to be regarded by the multitude not simply as the giving up of one view of religion, but as the giving up of all religion. Hence the early Christians were denounced by the pagan world as "atheists," and persecuted under that name, and for that crime. So likewise in the case of Socrates, one of the most religious men in all antiquity. Very probably the leading politicians who were active in his condemnation, cared but little about religion in any way; still their success was mainly owing to the fact, that it fell in with the vulgar clamor against him as an over-curious sceptic, and impious innovator. First of all, therefore, I insist that the frequent charge against great men of infidelity and irreligion, when resting on no better foundation than popular clamor, is to be listened to in all cases with extreme distrust.

Consider next the antagonisms of religious systems, and the jealousies of system-makers, or system-holders, as giving rise to the charge in question. A system of philosophy or religion is neither more nor less than an attempt to sum up and reconcile the facts in the case, as understood at the time. Of course, as a man's knowledge of these facts is cleared up, or refined, or enlarged, his system must be modified; and sometimes the modification is radical, leading him to view all things from a new stand-point, and under new connections and relations. Whenever this happens, the partisans of the old way of looking at the subject are offended and perplexed; they hardly know what to make of it; and in their impatience are ever ready to charge the new system with being not merely a new exposition of what was believed before, but a real or virtual denial of it. Hence almost every philosopher who has attempted a new solution of the great problem of life, or of the universe, has been stigmatized by his opponents, at least in the beginning, as an atheist.

So it was with Descartes, the great reformer of the science of mind in the seventeenth century. By candid critics he has been thought to have done more for religious truths and realities than any other philosopher, by the clear and sharp line of demarcation he was the first effectually to draw between matter and spirit. And besides, to show how far he was from denying or doubting either the being or the perfections of God, it is enough to say, that one of the peculiarities of his system consists in making every form of human certainty, excepting that of our own existence,—even the certainty of mathematical demonstrations,—to depend on the Divine veracity. All this, however, could not save him from being persecuted and driven out of Holland as an atheist, at the instigation of a knot of Protestant divines.

The same thing was soon afterwards attempted in England against Locke, though by no means with equal success. Locke's whole life, and all his opinions, as far as developed by himself, were a living refutation of such a charge. Moreover, his celebrated "Essay concerning Human Understanding" gives what is there styled "a demonstration" of the being of a God, and lays down the principle that we have more certain evidence of the Divine existence than we have of the existence of the external world. His "Reasonableness of Christianity" is also one of the ablest defences of revelation ever made. All this, however, went for nothing with a party who were alarmed at some of the aspects of his system of philosophy, and the freedom of some of his speculations, and a cry was got up, that he was no better than an atheist or deist "in disguise."

Patience in speaking of such conduct would seem at first sight to be little better than treason to truth and right. And yet, on second thoughts, why all this surprise and indignation at a fault so easily accounted for and explained, and withal, in its various degrees, so common? Have we yet to learn how few there are, even among good men, the habits of whose minds will allow them to be just to the opinions of their opponents?—especially where, as in this case, the matters in dispute are felt to be of great practical moment. The reason of this is also obvious. We see the opinions of our opponents from our own point of view, and not from theirs; and the consequence is, that we, I might almost say, by necessity, misconstrue them. Thus in respect to the misrepresentations complained of above: every man's argument for the being of a God rests on certain principles, which to his mind are essential to the conviction. When, therefore, these principles, or any of them, are assailed, it seems to him as if a blow was struck at the foundations of all religion. He forgets that principles which are necessary to his faith, or at least are thought by him to be necessary, are not so to that of his neighbor, who believes in God on totally different principles, and yet believes in Him just as sincerely, and just as devoutly. Let us therefore put the most charitable construction on the motives of these traducers; only we must remember that they are traducers, which brings us to the same conclusion as before. It would be easy to show, on historical grounds, that a considerable proportion of the great men who have been stigmatized in the polemics of the Church as unbelievers, have done nothing whatever to warrant the reproach.

But there is another class of great men under charge or suspicion of unbelief, who cannot be disposed of so easily. I mean those who have indulged, more or less, in what seem infidel speculations, and are often claimed by infidels as of their number, yet do not themselves accept the name, may, sometimes indignantly disclaim it. To this class belong several of the uneasy, questioning, and fiery spirits, who were thrown up into activity and consequence by the convulsions growing out of the Revival of Letters and the Protestant Reformation. I am not sure that any of these men deserve to be called great thinkers; but some of them were bold and original thinkers; and in their first attempts to go alone they often lost their way, and wandered into extravagances which can hardly be reconciled either with religion or anything else. For the most part, however, they indignantly repelled the charge of impiety or unbelief. One of the last of them, Vanini, burnt at Toulouse as an atheist, in 1619, on being asked at his trial if he believed in God, picked up a straw from the floor, and holding it out in his hand, said to his judges, "This straw, if there were nothing else, would constrain me to confess a Divine Author of Nature."

A similar remark is applicable to many of the great metaphysical thinkers in Germany, in recent times. It is common to hear these men referred to as the deniers and subverters of religion,—the modern Antichrist. On inquiry, however, it will be found that the professed, and, as far as I can see, the real purpose, of most of these writers was to supplant the shallow naturalism and rationalism already existing in the Church by a more profound and severe philosophy,—a philosophy, also, which would retain Christian ideas by showing that they enter into and make part of the highest thought of the age. Somebody, in defending the new philosophy, had presumed to institute a parallel between Kant's system of morals and that of Jesus. But Kant himself, to whom the manuscript was submitted, hastened to express a religious horror at the sight of his own name in such connection with that of Christ. He begs his friend not to publish the work; or if he should, he charges him to erase the offensive parallel, using these memorable words: "One of those names, that before which the Heavens bow, is sacred, whilst the other is only that of a poor scholar, endeavoring to explain, to the best of his abilities, the teachings of his Master." * Hegel, also, professed to the last his belief in the ordinary faith of the Lutheran Church, and held it to be a principal recommendation of his system, that it supplied a scientific basis for what are called "evangelical doctrines."

Here, then, is another view of the matter, which strengthens my conviction that the reputed number of great men justly chargeable with unbelief vastly exceeds the real number. Even of those who have done something to provoke, and, it may be, to authorize the suspicion by the infidel look or tendency of their speculations, only a few, a very few, have professedly taken infidel ground. Professedly they have labored to reform, and in some cases to restate and refound the popular religion, in order to reconcile it with the progress of thought on other subjects, but not to overthrow it.

“What!” the objector will say, “is it not clear, that whoever accepts this or that doctrine, or adopts this or that system, cannot consistently believe in Christianity?” Grant that he cannot consistently; I submit that this is not the question. What hinders him from doing it inconsistently,—yet really and sincerely? Who does not know that mankind are full of inconsistencies? Certainly, therefore, it would be taking a strange, I had almost said a ludicrous position, to assume that nothing can be true of a man’s faith, even in matters the most difficult, abstract, and remote, which involve an inconsistency on his part. In such a case, the real or alleged inconsistency is nothing to one who does not see it. To your eyes the faith is self-destructive, because self-contradictory; but to his eyes it is neither the one, nor the other; that is, the difficulty does not exist, at least so far as the reality and sincerity of his faith are concerned.

“But the system, as carried out by the school, has ended, in point of fact, in rank infidelity, perhaps in rank atheism." To this I reply, first, that for "school" in the statement under consideration we must generally, if not always, read "some of the school." The system of Locke, in the hands of his French followers, ended in the denial of all religion; but not so with the bulk of his English followers. The same is also true of the system of Hegel, the last and most extreme form of German idealism: while one wing of that school openly spurns the very thought of God, the other still adheres, like its master, not only to Christianity, but also to church orthodoxy. Besides, suppose that the system, when fully carried out, is seen by all to end in materialism, fatalism, pantheism,—I care not what. You have a right to charge the legitimate consequences of a system on the system itself; but not on the author of the system, any further than you have reason to believe that he foresaw and accepted them. It is but seldom that all the legitimate consequences of a new principle, or a new system, are foreseen or even suspected at the beginning. When, therefore, a religious man invents or adopts a system, which afterwards develops consequences subversive of religion, it is but fairness to assume, that he was not aware of these consequences, and that if he had been, he would have rejected the consequences, and the system too.

"Yes; but infidels claim these great men as being on their side." Very likely they do, and for obvious reasons. Sylvain Maréchal, in his "Dictionary of Atheists," comprehends in his list almost every original thinker whom the world has known. In the same spirit, Jeremy Bentham refers, in his correspondence, again and again to private conversations with reputed Christians, including several dignitaries of the Church of England, from which he chose to gather, that not a few of them had as little faith in the popular religion as himself. But what does this prove? There are two ways of accounting for these absurd imputations,—absurd, at least, in the extent to which they have been carried. In the first place, narrow-minded and conceited men,—men who see clearly perhaps as far as they see at all, but want largeness of view,—are apt to think that whoever agrees with them in some things, must agree with them in everything. And, secondly, in the case under consideration, infidels are strongly tempted by the desire, consciously or unconsciously entertained, to make up for the want of numbers and popular sympathy by the prestige of great names.

My conclusion is, that there are no just grounds for the infidel taunt, that great men, on becoming great, outgrow Christianity.

At the same time, we must take care not to fall into the opposite error of making too much of greatness in this connection. The Scriptures, experience, common-sense, concur in protesting against the doctrine that men are always or generally religious or Christian in proportion to their abilities or worldly distinction. Remember our Lord's words: "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." Remember also what was said by an apostle: "For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called."

These passages are to be explained, it is true, and limited by reference to the times. At the first promulgation of the Gospel, the great men of the day were committed in a thousand ways, politically and socially, as well as intellectually and religiously, to the established worship. If they knew more than others, it only followed, as a general rule, that they had so much the more to unlearn before they were in a condition to receive the new faith. If, as was generally the case, they looked down with contempt or indifference on the faith and rites of their own country, they were not likely to entertain much respect for a new religious movement, of which they understood nothing, except that it was an offshoot from Judaism, and came up from the depths of society. We mistake the matter entirely, if we suppose that the great men of Greece and Rome troubled themselves to make up a serious and well-considered judgment on the merits or evidences of Christianity, at the time and on the spot. They rejected it without examination, just as we should have been likely to do in their place; and this being the case, their rejection of it, no matter what may have been their competency and opportunity in other respects, signifies nothing.

Accordingly, in looking back on the first preaching of the Gospel, we do not deny, we do not wonder, that it was the common people almost alone who heard it "gladly," while the bulk of what are called the higher classes, the really great and the would-be great, stood aloof. Nevertheless, we say, it was not for anything in greatness itself, but because their greatness placed them in circumstances which blinded their eyes to a revelation from heaven.

To a certain extent this remark applies, also, to the great men of succeeding times. Among the adverse circumstances in which they are almost always placed, we may mention, first, the press of worldly avocations, leaving them but little leisure to bestow on religion. It is so particularly with statesmen, professional men, merchants in large business, and men of letters,—even their hours of apparent leisure are filled with care. Strange as it may seem, it is nevertheless true, that men who read the most, often read the least on religious subjects. If a man has but one book in the world, it is commonly the Bible; and if he reads no other book, he is likely to read that so much the more. Accordingly, we must not be surprised if we often meet with men who are great and learned on other subjects, but whose knowledge on the subject of religion is exceedingly limited and superficial, — more so than that of many in the humblest walks in life.

Again, there are other circumstances incident to superior rank and learning, but adverse to religion. I may mention first, the pride of standing and intellect engendered by the consciousness of such superiority. Minds thus affected are slow to look with desire or respect upon gifts and graces which God, in his great mercy, has placed within the reach of all. There is also the secret feeling, no matter how unfounded and fallacious, that religion, though necessary perhaps to the bulk of the community, is not so to them, inasmuch as they have substitutes for it in a higher culture, in philosophy, and in a just sense of character and reputation. Then, too, there are the temptations of power, and opportunity, and prosperity. Great men, as well as others, are liable to prejudice, vice, and worldly ambition, “the lust of the flesh, and the lust of the eye, and the pride of life”; and these, like fevers in the strongest constitutions, are often found to produce the worst effects in the most richly endowed minds.

Add to this, that men are often accounted great, and justly so, because they are great in particular things, in single endowments,—for example, in mere intellect, or in mere force of will. Nobody denies that such men effect great changes in the world; yet in the qualities necessary to understand the nature of Christianity, or even to appreciate its evidences, they sometimes fall far below the average of mankind.

Putting all these things together, we can be at no loss to account for the fact, that some really great men reject Christianity, and that many really great men, though admitting its truth and obligation, are unfaithful to it. In no case, however, is it from their greatness in itself considered; on the contrary, true greatness always has favored, and always will favor a religious interpretation of nature and law, of human life and human destiny. If I were asked what is the radical difficulty in religion to most sceptics, I should answer, Because it transcends experience. But this difficulty will have comparatively but little weight with a really great man, because, by his discoveries, inventions, and conjectures, he is continually doing the very same thing. He is prepared for, he is continually expecting, new revelations of truth and reality.

Moreover, the really great man is eminently a man of faith. What made Columbus a great man was not, as it has been justly said, his discovery of a new world, but his sailing away into an unknown and trackless ocean, on the strength of his faith in an idea.

History will confirm everything I have said. I cannot recall a single individual of the very highest order of mind, who has set himself in opposition to religion. The active enemies of religion are mostly made up of men ambitious of greatness, but unable to achieve it. Stung by the failure, they have turned against the dearest instincts and the most sacred traditions of mankind, seeking, and sometimes finding, in this reckless course the vulgar substitute for greatness,—notoriety.

If then you are at any time tempted to abandon your principles and hopes as Christians, consider, I beseech you, before you take a step that may be irretrievable, into what connection and fellowship it will bring your name and fortunes. It will be with men who owe whatever consequence and notoriety they have obtained much less to any superiority of their gifts than to the wantonness in which they have misapplied what gifts they had; with men, who even when they have taken under their protection a good cause, civil liberty, for example, have afterwards almost invariably disgraced and ruined it by lawlessness and excess;—with men who have begun with denying their obligations to God, and commonly ended with making a jest of their obligations to one another;—with men, in fine, who would take from human nature its principal dignity in success, its principal support in trouble, its principal guard in temptation, leaving nothing in their place but the melancholy pride of thinking to be able to see what others cannot,—that we are without a Father, and without hope.

And you who are almost persuaded to become Christians, consider I beseech you, with whom an earnest and humble faith will bring you into communion. It will bring you into communion with the men to whom the world is indebted for almost every advance it has made in true civilization. It will bring you into communion with the men the monuments of whose benevolent enterprise are in every land, diffusing the inestimable blessings of truth and order and liberty. It will bring you into communion with the men who are pledged in a thousand ways to honor, virtue, and philanthropy; and all these pledges redeemed, the communion on earth will become a communion in heaven,—of all those whose names are written in the Book of Life.

THE INWARD MANIFESTATION OF CHRIST.

JUDAS SAITH UNTO HIM, (NOT ISCARIOT,) LORD, HOW IS IT THAT THOU WILT MANIFEST THYSELF UNTO US, AND NOT UNTO THE WORLD? — John xiv. 22.

THE disciple who put this question to our Lord was still under the influence of that prejudice of his countrymen, which led them to expect that when the Messiah manifested himself, it would be by openly assuming the office of the Restorer of Israel. But this step, whenever he should take it, would have the effect to manifest him to his enemies and to the public, as well as to his immediate followers. What then could he mean, when he spake, as he had just been doing, of manifesting himself unto his disciples, and not unto the world?

No proper conception had as yet been formed, even by the Apostles, of that inward and spiritual manifestation of himself which Christ is continually making to his friends. And even since that time, the fate of this doctrine in the Church has not been much better. In the hands of the mystics, with whom it has always been a favorite topic, it has been made to assume so preternatural, so fantastic, or at best so vague and shadowy a form, as to induce sober-minded and practical men to have as little to do with it as possible. But this is not the way, as it seems to me, in which we should treat any solemn and emphatic inculcation of the New Testament; certainly not when, as in the case before us, it can be vindicated on rational grounds, and set in a clear light, from its conformity to one of those great laws of mind and life which all are concerned to know.

I can best indicate this law by the help of a familiar illustration.

Take two men of strongly marked characters, and of like tastes, dispositions, and pursuits,—two poets, for example, two men of business, or two philanthropists; let there be no occasion of jealousy or rivalry between them, and it is obvious that they will understand and appreciate and believe each other better than they otherwise would, merely because on the great subjects on which they think and feel most deeply, they think and feel in common. The poet will understand, appreciate, and believe the poet; the man of business will understand, appreciate, and believe the man of business; the philanthropist will understand, appreciate, and believe the philanthropist. Again, let the conditions of the supposed case be reversed. Bring together a poet and one who is the reverse of a poet, a business man and a recluse student, or an earnest philanthropist and a heartless egotist and trifler, and what will follow? Not only will they be "unequally yoked" in other respects, but they will find it difficult, if not impossible, to understand, appreciate, or believe each other, because on the great subjects on which they think and feel most deeply, they think and feel diversely. To persons of such different tastes, dispositions, and pursuits, not only the same words, but the same actions and the same things, have a different meaning, that is to say, they will suggest different and sometimes opposite ideas and trains of thought. In common and every-day affairs such men may get along well enough together, because here the distinctive peculiarities of neither party are much brought out; but let them be put into situations in which these peculiarities are brought out strongly, and the life of each will become a marvel, a puzzle, an insolvable mystery to the other.

The fact, I suppose, will be generally admitted, as here stated; and by penetrating a little deeper we shall find an explanation of the fact. Words, of themselves, reveal nothing. When we speak of colors or odors, pleasures or pains, it is always on the supposition that those whom we address have experienced these sensations: else we should not expect to be understood. The same is true when we speak of courage, pity, generosity, self-devotion: we presume that those whom we address have had some experience of these affections; otherwise, we should not expect to be understood. And this remark extends also to natural language, — to looks and gestures, — even to actions themselves, when considered as expressing the principles or emotions from which they spring. To those who have had some experience of these principles or emotions, who know what acting from them is, and what it means, these actions will be as external signs of the principles or emotions to which they belong: to others they will signify nothing. This is the reason why men who are conscious of acting from none but low and sordid motives, come at length to deny or doubt the existence of higher motives. Again, it is the reason why, in an age of formalism in religion and general profligacy of manners, if a prophet, a martyr, or a radical reformer appears, he is everywhere cried out upon as an impracticable man, a fanatic, and a “dreamer of dreams,” — perhaps as insane. It is not merely, as some would seem to think, because his rebukes and warnings are offensive and irritating; but because his whole being is a moral enigma; because he cannot make himself to be understood by persons so unlike himself.

This then is the conclusion to which we are brought. Conduct, in the largest sense of that word, — conduct considered as including the principles of action, as well as the actions themselves, is properly and fully intelligible only in so far as men are educated up to the same level of moral progress. Where all participation stops, all sympathy stops; and where all sympathy stops, all true and living communication, all true and living manifestation, stops.

To all this it may be objected that “humanity is entire in every individual”; — that is to say, every individual has something of every human quality, enough in degree to prepare him to understand and believe in the existence of that quality in any degree in another person. But, in the first place, I deny that the higher virtues do exist even in a degree in all minds, if by this is understood existence in a state of actual development. The germs of all human qualities are to be found, I suppose, in every human soul; but it does not follow that all these germs have even so much as begun to be unfolded, and until this takes place the individual is not conscious of them; that is, they are to him as if they were not. Admitting, however, for the sake of the argument, that all virtues do exist in all minds, the only difference being a difference of degree, who does not perceive that this difference of degree is alone sufficient to give rise to a want of mutual understanding and sympathy? Of course a man who has actually felt compassion, for example, though in a low degree, must have some idea of what is meant by compassion in general, and even of compassion considered as existing in much higher degrees. Still it is found, in a practical view of the subject, that men are extremely sceptical, if not absolutely incredulous, as to the actual existence of any feeling or moral sentiment in a degree much above that to which they have themselves attained. Hence it is that selfish and narrow-minded men always suspect the disinterested virtues; and hence, too, cold and phlegmatic men are apt to suspect the sincerity of enthusiasts, and to look around for by-motives — how unreasonably, I need not say. Enthusiasts have their full share of imperfections, I allow; but it does not require much reflection to perceive that they are among the last people in the world to play a part. The cold and phlegmatic are much more likely to be insincere even in the little to which they pretend. Nevertheless, such is the constitution of the human mind that we find it extremely difficult, in practice, to believe in the actual existence of any feeling or virtue in a degree so much above that in which we possess it as to be beyond our sympathy. We may not choose to pronounce the feeling or virtue.

so much above our own, to be a pretence, an imposture, an impossibility ; still we shall be very likely to act under a vague impression that, somehow or other, it is in part at least unreal. As was said before, where all participation ends all sympathy ends, and where all sympathy ends all mutual understanding and all proper communication end.

This then would seem to be a universal law. I have taken some pains to set it in as clear a light as I could, on account of its wide and manifold practical applications ; but of these the only one to be insisted on here respects the doctrine of the text : Jesus Christ manifesting himself to his friends, and not to the world.

By this manifesting of Christ we understand the manifesting of what is Divine in his doctrine, his person, and his life ; causing it to be perceived, comprehended, and felt. But, according to the law just laid down, that we may comprehend and be assured of Divinity anywhere, it is necessary that what is Divine in our own nature should first be awakened and developed, so as to bring us into communication with it. To whom is manifested what is Divine in the outward universe ? It does not depend on the perfection of the outward senses ; nor yet on the acuteness or comprehensiveness of the pure intellect : for there have been men, all whose perceptive and logical powers were of the highest order, who yet could see nothing in the material world but the play of a mute and dead machinery, obeying the laws of a necessity as mute and dead as itself. And this, I suppose, would always be the tendency of our intellectual faculties if we had no other faculties, — if we were all head and no heart, — if we had not moral and spiritual sensibilities to be touched by the countless traces of a righteous rule, a beneficent purpose, and a Father's care. I might go further still: I might say, that it is only in so far as, in the language of Scripture, we become "partakers of the Divine nature" that we can enter into or even approximate, the full significancy of the Divinity of God. Many hold, and, as I believe, on good evidence, that there never was a people so ignorant and degraded as to have no object of worship, — no God at all; but how different that God, beginning with the rude fetich before which the savage mutters his incantations, and attaining at last to the Judge and Father of all whom the enlightened Christian loves, trusts, and adores. And this change is found to keep pace, in every country and in every age, with the progressive development of men's moral and spiritual ideas.

alone; "but not so," some will say, "with us who have the Bible in our hands, clearly manifesting God and Christ to all,—alike to the righteous and to the wicked,—to those who think, and to those who do not."

Nothing can well be further from the truth than such a statement. Need I say again that words of themselves reveal nothing; that the only meaning which any words have, or can have, is that which we give to them, and which we must first have in our minds in order to give. We can take up the language of Scripture, I know, and call God "holy," "just," and "good"; but what these words will really signify to our minds must depend on our own ideas of what constitutes holiness, justice, and goodness. Of course our conceptions of the Deity must still vary according to the degree of purity and elevation which, from a true Christian culture, our own moral and spiritual ideas have attained. Who then will pretend, though we do have the same Bible, that what is Divine in the teachings and life of Jesus is manifested alike to all? Take any part of his discourses,—the Beatitudes, for example,—and who does not perceive how much more meaning benevolent and devout men will attach to the words than others do or can? with how much more life, force, and distinctness everything will be apprehended, merely because the reader's mind is thoroughly imbued with the spirit which the passage breathes? Above all, who can enter into, or practically understand, the deep spiritual experiences of Christ,—his inmost springs of action,—the life of his life,—if he is a stranger to like aspirations? Or, take the holy Communion,—who will say that Christ is manifested equally and alike to all persons, whether devout or undevout, in that solemn service? Alas for us! take the best man that lives, and, from want of a like elevation of soul, how inadequately must he be able to sympathize with, or comprehend, in all its extent, that sublime spirit of self-sacrifice which moved the Sinless One to lay down his life for a guilty world!

But here a difficulty presents itself, which we must not pass over without a word of explanation. “We are to be made good by what the Scriptures reveal, and yet it now appears that it is only in proportion as we have become good that we can enter fully and entirely into the meaning and spirit of what is there revealed. Is not this making the effect to come before the cause?” I answer: In most things we must first know, in order to love and practise; but in morals and religion the rule is often reversed,—we must first love and practise in order to know. “What, then, is to induce us to love and practise?” I answer again: By our trials and failures, by meditation and earnest prayer, there is awakened in us a deep sense of moral and spiritual wants, which are feebly represented by the physical cravings of hunger and thirst, — wants which we feel and know the world cannot satisfy; and this leads us to look beyond and above the world. Christianity proffers us, while in this state of mind, the means of the great salvation, which we must accept, in the first instance, walking, for the most part, by faith, and not by sight; for it is not until we have experienced their adaptation to the soul, and their harmony with eternal truth, that our trust is changed into assurance, and our hope into fruition and peace. Nor does it end with beginning. Every new moral and spiritual aspiration prepares the way for a new revelation of moral and spiritual truth; and this again elevates us, so to express it, to a higher level of the soul's progress, from which still higher aspirations may commence. Thus it is that Jesus is continually manifesting himself, and manifesting himself more and more unto his friends, and not unto the world.

Behold why it is that Christianity, with the same Bible to define and expound it, is so different a thing in one age from what it is in another, in one country from what it is in another, to one person from what it is to another. Behold also the element of progress in Christianity, linking it indissolubly, by the ties of a mutual dependence, to the progressive civilization of the world, and the progressive education of the human race. Behold, moreover, how much less the highest manifestations of revealed truth depend on the exclusive culture of the sciences of logic and interpretation, than upon the actual progress which a whole people has made in liberty, holiness, and love. After all, there are depths in the divinity of our Saviour's teachings and life, into the full significancy of which we cannot hope to enter, so long as our spiritual vision is dimmed by the mists of earthly prejudice, earthly passions, and earthly care. "What I do," said our Saviour, "thou knowest not now; but thou shalt know hereafter." The revelations of eternity must come in to solve the enigmas of time. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when Christ shall appear, we shall be like him"; and because we are like him, "we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as He is pure."

THE STUDENT'S SABBATH.

THE SABBATH WAS MADE FOR MAN, AND NOT MAN FOR THE SABBATH. — Mark ii. 27.

WHEN it is said that "the Sabbath was made for man," the meaning is, that it was made for his use and benefit. It does not mean that he has a right to use it, or not; nor yet that it is his in such a sense, that he has a right to put it to whatever use he pleases. It still supposes that the Sabbath has its appropriate and legitimate uses, and that it is the duty of every individual to ascertain what these uses are, and avail himself of them.

They are reducible, as it seems to me, to two: rest from secular labor, and opportunity for moral and religious culture.

Some have thought to add to these a third, namely, the favor and content of the people, secured by giving part of the day at least to social pleasures and recreations. This appears to have been the policy of the Catholic Church from remote ages. It was adopted by the Anglican Church in its early struggles with the Puritans, and did as much, perhaps, as any other one thing to drive to extreme measures that austere and uncompromising sect. At this moment on the continent of Europe this policy is understood to be almost universal among Christians of all denominations.

We have a right to ask, Has it worked well? Certainly not, if we are to find the answer in the results. All agree that in those countries where it has most prevailed there has been a lamentable falling away from the ancient strictness of faith and practice. I know it is common to ascribe this defection, so far as Protestant countries are concerned, to the sceptical or unspiritual writings of critics and philosophers. But whence these writings? Why there more than here? As a general rule it will be found that they have but attended and reflected, step by step in the downward course, the sceptical or unspiritual state of the public mind. The writings have not, to any considerable extent, caused the evil; they have only reflected it. The cause, as it seems to me, is still to be traced, in no small part, to the neglect or misappropriation of holy time; first, by the higher classes only; at last, by all classes.

Could anything better have been expected? Undoubtedly it is desirable that Sunday should be the happiest day of the seven; but then it should become so by our loving its appropriate and legitimate uses, and not by our turning it to other and inconsistent uses. But what, you may ask, is to be done for those who have no taste, as yet, for religious exercises, and no inclination for self-communion, or moral and spiritual culture?

I answer, that Sunday, and the whole of Sunday, should be devoted to giving them this taste, and this inclination. I do not deny that there are such things as gloom and asceticism; these we are to avoid in our Sabbatical observances, as well as in everything else. But gloom and asceticism do not come from giving too much time to religion; they come from false views of religion.

Besides, I cannot help observing generally, in this connection, that modern sentimentalism has a little too much to say about happiness in religion,—happiness as pertaining not only to the mature life of the Christian, but also to the process by which that life is formed. In looking to the promises of Scripture it is apt to overlook the conditions on which these promises are suspended. We are told, it is true, that “perfect love casteth out fear”; but the love of most persons, and even of most Christians, is far from being “perfect”; hence that other Scripture, “Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling.” We must take things as they are; we must take man as he is. When we consider how much the best of us have to look back upon each week that ought to humble us, and fill us with regret and anxiety, every one must perceive that the duties of Sunday, which consist pre-eminently of self-examination, and the offices of penitence and prayer, cannot, if faithfully performed, dispose men to merry-making of any kind, or be reconciled with it. There is a serious joy which accompanies every well-directed effort for self-improvement; this joy belongs especially to Sunday, and with it we should be content.

Still the question may be pressed, "Is it not better that the irreligious part of the community should be accustomed to connect Sunday with agreeable rather than with disagreeable associations?" Undoubtedly it is; provided only, that the appropriate and legitimate uses of the institution, to themselves or others, are not frustrated or essentially compromised thereby. But remember, our principal objection to the intrusion of worldly cares and recreations into consecrated hours is not, that they take up the time needed for more important objects, though this alone would be insuperable, but that their tendency is to dissipate the mind, and divert it from that profound seriousness, without which the exercises of religion, however punctiliously and sanctimoniously gone through with, degenerate into a form of godliness without the power. Christianity was not given in order to multiply amusements for the irreligious part of the community. God forbid, that we should try, or wish, to make the sinner happy in his sins, or in the neglect or misappropriation of one of the principal means by which he is likely to be reclaimed from his sins.

I return, therefore, to the position taken in the beginning of this discourse. The benefits resulting from the Christian Sabbath are reducible to two,—rest from secular cares, and opportunity for moral and religious culture.

It is common to dwell on these with special reference to the wants of the uneducated and laboring classes, meaning by the laboring classes those who labor with their hands. Here it may not be amiss to reverse the practice, and consider this whole subject with particular reference to the duty and the needs of men who labor with their minds,—the scholar's Sabbath day.

In the first place, it is obvious that students, professional men, and men of letters, from the very nature of their occupations, are peculiarly in danger of neglecting the duties and losing the advantages of a weekly day of rest. The husbandman pursues his calling in the open fields; the mechanic in the noisy workshop; the mercantile classes in the market-place, and the thronged city. Their work, therefore, must be suspended. Its continuance would arrest public attention, and neither public opinion nor the laws of the land would allow it to go on, as it would interfere with the proper observance of the day by others. But no such external restraint is felt by the scholar, or the professional man. Neither the law nor public opinion follows him home, to pronounce judgment on what he reads or thinks; and consequently there is nothing but his own sense of propriety to hinder him from reading the same books, and pursuing the same investigations, on Sunday as on other days. Nor is this all. Even his own sense of propriety will be apt to be blinded or misled on this particular question by a vague notion, not unfrequently entertained, that Sunday, as a day of rest, was intended for what are called, by way of distinction, the laboring classes; and again, that Sunday, as a day for moral and religious instruction, was intended chiefly for the uneducated classes.

Both these assumptions, I think it will not be difficult to show, are unfounded.

First, as to the benefits of a day of rest to those who labor with their minds, and not with their hands. In reply to the objection sometimes made, that it is a loss of so much time, at least as regards men's worldly occupations, it has been proved again and again in respect to bodily labor, that more work is probably done in the course of the year with this occasional respite, than would or could be done without it. The same is also true of mental toil. None of our faculties or organs appear to be so constituted as to be able to bear a long-continued strain. The brain may be overloaded and overworked as well as the stomach or the limbs; and this overworking depends quite as much—nay, I think I may say, a great deal more—on its being unremitted, than on its being intense for a time. Who has never gazed at an object until all clearness and distinctness of vision was lost? Who has never studied a subject day after day without being able to master it; but upon giving his mind a little time for relaxation, and then returning to it again, has been able to master it at once?

I grant that persons raised above the necessity of manual labor belong, as a general rule, to that portion of the community which can best afford to live at ease. On this account it is true perhaps, as a general rule, that they are less likely, than the humbler classes, to overtask themselves, or be overtasked by others; and hence it may be inferred that they do not stand so much in need of an appointed and legalized day of rest. But in estimating the value of an institution like this to a class, it is not enough to know whether many or few will be affected by it directly. Only a few may be bene fited by it directly; and yet through them the benefits resulting from it indirectly to the whole community may be immense. Let it be that but a small proportion of students and professional or public men stand much in need of the physical relief which Sunday brings, or ought to bring, to the overworked mind; still we should remember that, small as this proportion is, it will probably comprise the élite,—those from whom the world has most to hope. Though they do not constitute the majority of the class, they probably constitute those who have most influence in the class;—in proportion of numbers not more, perhaps, than one to a hundred, yet in proportion of merit and public promise it may be as a hundred to one. Any institution, therefore, which tends to keep eager and earnest minds of this description from premature death, or from lingering disease which is the death of their prospects and their usefulness, is an incalculable good, not only to them, but to the whole class and the whole community.

Imperfectly as the day is kept, there can be no doubt that it prevents much evil in this way; if it were kept as it ought to be, it would prevent much more. I have no occasion to press any argument beyond what it will easily bear. I am willing to suppose that the early decline, not infrequent in the class of young persons of whom the highest hopes are entertained, is often to be traced to that peculiar sensitiveness of the nervous system, or that peculiar delicacy of organization, which belongs to precocious minds. Still physical differences of this description can only be regarded as predisposing, and not as proximate, causes of disease. Even in such cases, therefore, it is still true, that the proximate cause of disease is almost always over-exertion, — over-exertion for such a constitution; and this over-exertion would certainly be less likely to take place if secular studies and secular thoughts were not allowed to encroach on holy time.

And so in after life. Here, too, the most valuable lives are most in jeopardy, because most likely to be pressed and importuned by important business and public cares. There is good reason to believe that a proper observance of the Lord's day would have saved many such lives from a premature and melancholy close. Mr. Wilberforce, after hearing that Lord Castlereagh had destroyed himself, wrote as follows in his diary: "He was certainly deranged, — the effect probably of continued wear and tear of mind. But the strong impression of my mind is, that it is the effect of the non-observance of Sunday, both as abstracting from politics, from the constant recurrence of the same reflections, and as correcting the false views of worldly things, and bringing them down to their true diminutiveness."

Again, writing to a friend, and referring to a similar catastrophe in the case of another eminent individual, Sir Samuel Romilly, he says: "I am strongly impressed by the recollection of your endeavor to prevail on the lawyers to give up Sunday consultations, in which poor Romilly would not concur. If he had suffered his mind to enjoy such occasional remissions, it is highly probable the strings would never have snapped, as they did, from over-tension."*

Thus much in proof that eager and faithful students, including also all men of large cares and earnest thought, stand in need of Sunday as a day of rest from mental toil. They also stand in need of it as a day of religious instruction and moral and spiritual culture.

And, first, as regards religious instruction. Because a man knows one thing very well, we are apt to presume that he knows other things; but this by no means follows. For example: because a man is an eminent naturalist, it does not follow that he knows everything, or anything, about ethics or political economy. And it follows less now than at any former period. The sciences have become so multiplied, and each is pursued so far, that an individual, if he wishes to distinguish himself in any department of human inquiry, must give himself to it almost exclusively. The day for universal scholarship is past, never to return. We find no fault with this state of things, for we see that it is an inevitable condition of human progress; but we contend that an exception ought to be made, for obvious reasons, in favor of morality and religion. All, especially in the educated and influential classes, whatever else they know or do not know, should know something about morality and religion. For this, therefore, adequate provision should be made in the arrangements of society; and such provision is made by the institution of the Christian Sabbath; during which the theory certainly is, whatever may be the practice, that all secular and professional cares and studies should be suspended, the thoughts being mainly turned upon those questions which belong to our eternal peace.

Such provision, always needed, even by liberally educated men, is becoming more and more so for another reason, — I mean the change which has taken place in the spirit and aim of education itself. We can go back to the time when almost all the learning in the world was in the Church, and for the Church. Our boasted system of common schools grew mainly out of the Puritan principle, that every individual should be put into a condition to read the Bible for himself. What first led to the founding of this college was the fear that otherwise the succession of learned and faithful ministers would fail. Yet we have lived to see the day when the question is gravely discussed, whether the Bible ought to be read in common schools. Also, in this college, still purporting to be dedicated to Christ and the Church, the Greek New Testament, though for more than a century the only text-book in the language, has dropped at last entirely out of the academical course. I do not mention these changes in order to condemn them. For anything I have to say at present, they may all be for the better, and not for the worse. One thing, however, is plain: in so far as religious instruction is excluded from general and professional education it follows incontestably, that the so-called educated classes are not any more likely than others to be well informed in religious matters.

And do not facts sustain this view? When the conversation turns on questions calling for familiarity with Scripture, or with the grounds and limitations of disputed doctrines, or with the history of the controversy with unbelievers, or with different sects, I do not find that scientific or professional men are any more at home on such topics than intelligent farmers or mechanics. And not only so. When unauthorized and crude novelties are broached under the name of religion, or, which is just as bad, when a temporary reaction takes place in favor of cast-off errors and superstitions, I find that a full proportion of educated men and women, and of the so-called higher classes, are carried away by the folly. Does not this prove that a full proportion of those classes have yet to be "rooted and grounded" in what "be the first principles of the oracles of God"? From all which I think we have a right to conclude, that, regarding Sunday merely as affording opportunity for religious instruction, the great body of what are called the higher and the educated classes stand in need of it, as well as others, and as much as others.

But the benefits resulting from Sunday in respect to Christian knowledge are inconsiderable when compared with the benefits resulting from it in respect to Christian morals and piety, to Christian nurture. Those who think to class the observance of the Lord's day under the head of outward forms and ceremonies entirely mistake the nature and purpose of the institution. It is not a form or ceremony of any kind, but an appointed season, a set time, which we are to give, as we best may, to the means of moral and spiritual culture. You might just as well rank under the head of outward forms and ceremonies the four years spent at college, or the three years spent in the study of a profession. The education of the heart is just as much education, as the education of the head; and for the former at least, all, I suppose, will agree that frequent opportunities are as indispensable to the learned as to the unlearned. There is some connection, it must be confessed, between strength and activity of intellect on other subjects, and strength and activity of intellect on the subject of religion; but there is no necessary connection whatever between either, and that devotion of heart and life which God requires. A giant intellect is no more the substance or the sign of moral superiority than a giant frame. On the contrary, the very consciousness of great mental power, co-operating with the pride and selfishness of man's heart, is of the nature of a temptation, and on this account needs especially to be kept under by the frequent discipline of self-examination and prayer.

To such as object to keeping particular days holy, on the ground that every day should be kept holy, there are two answers: one assuming that the objection is made in good faith; the other, that it is a mere pretext.

I have no doubt that the early Quakers were perfectly sincere in what they said on this subject; but then it should be remembered that they did keep every day holy. Whoever takes up with their doctrine respecting the Sabbath, ought, at least, in order to be consistent, to take up with their practice on other days, abstaining from all worldly amusements, and also from all worldly occupations of a question able character or tendency. Even then, however, we should not be satisfied. Not that we would not have every day kept holy; but this is our position. We would have Sunday kept holy in one way, that is, by giving it to public and private worship, and to serious reading and meditation, and the rest of the week kept holy in another way, that is, by giving it to the faithful and earnest discharge of duty in the business of society and the world. Nay, more; we are persuaded that, unless one day in the week is kept holy in the way first mentioned, the other days are not likely, in the end, to be kept holy in any way. And for proof of this I would refer to the history of Quakerism itself. Spiritually-minded men who are tempted to think lightly of consecrated times and places, and outward ordinances, would do well to consider that those sects which maintain these fixtures and bulwarks of the religious sentiment stand as strong as ever, while those, on the contrary, which began by abandoning them have either faded away, or, to prevent this, have been constrained essentially to modify their original plan.

As for those who talk about one day being as good as another, without taking care to make any day what it ought to be, I suppose we have a right to regard the whole as mere pretext, resorted to as an excuse for religious indifference. In arguing with such persons, it would, perhaps, be out of place to appeal to the highest principles of human action, for they do not recognize these principles. But as some who take this ground are not unwilling to acknowledge the moral and social benefits of Christianity, it may not be without avail to urge that all these are put in peril by the neglect of the Lord's day. It is a significant fact, that, in speaking of our frontier settlements, travellers agree in this, that, whenever they have found themselves beyond the reach of the Sabbath, they have also found themselves beyond the reach of Christian civilization. Even in the most favored regions, the best men deplore their inability to keep the day as they would. And what is the reason? It is because the six days given to the world are more than a match for the one day given to heaven. If it were not for this one day given to heaven, the world would swallow up every thought, every care.

My friends, as a general rule we are not wont to trifle with our important temporal interests: let us not trifle with our moral and religious interests, merely because they are eternal. "Remember the Sabbath day, to keep it holy." As educated men, we need it;—we need it for our own good, for our own safety. We owe it also to others; for it is only in this way that the genius and learning of the country are likely to be elevated and purified by the Christian spirit. And what the Scriptures affirm of the individual is pre-eminently true of the community: "if the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness."

Think not, because I have said that something is to be done on the Christian Sabbath, that I would compromise its benefits as a day of rest. To the mind change is rest. And, besides, if the day is spent as it ought to be, it will lead us to take another view of the entire work of life, — dignifying it by a higher significance given to its responsibilities, and making the whole a service of freedom and satisfaction, because of choice and love.

PRAYER.

IF YE THEN, BEING EVIL, KNOW HOW TO GIVE GOOD GIFTS UNTO YOUR CHILDREN, HOW MUCH MORE SHALL YOUR FATHER WHICH IS IN HEAVEN GIVE GOOD THINGS TO THEM THAT ASK HIM?
— Matthew vii. 11.

SUPPLICATION, or prayer, is the natural language of weakness, dependence, and fear. When in trouble and perplexity, when the danger is pressing, and we from any cause feel unequal to the exigency, it is as natural for us to cry out for help, as to groan when in pain, or weep at scenes of distress. If any one is near who can save us, who is thought to hold our fate in his hands, or is looked up to as greatly our superior in wisdom or station, our cries are spontaneously directed to him. Thus it is that the child often turns to his parents, the sick man to his physician, the slave to his master, the subject to his prince, in the language and look, as well as in the spirit, of prayer. In the appropriate circumstances it is as natural for us to pray as to speak. When there is occasion for it, our language takes the form of petition or entreaty as readily and naturally, as it takes that of question or command when there is occasion for that. Prayer is the fit, natural, and spontaneous utterance of those who need help, when in the presence, or in the supposed presence, of those who can render it if they will. A sense of propriety, self-respect, pride, reserve, and a multitude of other causes, may induce a man to keep silence at such times; but it can only be by restraining one of the most distinctly pronounced tendencies of human nature.

Thus far I have spoken of prayer in general, — of prayer as it might exist, and would exist, if there were no such thing as religion.

Passing now to prayer in religion, the first remark which occurs to me is, that it differs not from prayer as above described in occasion or form, nor essentially in its nature or spirit, but only in its object. Prayer in religion is addressed to an Invisible Being. It supposes a communication between the visible and the invisible worlds. It takes for granted two facts: first, that a being, or perhaps that many beings exist of a higher order than ourselves; and, secondly, that he or they can be moved by our supplications. Deny these facts and you deny religion, and, of course, all foundation for prayer in religion. Admit these facts, and prayer, as a religious act, becomes as natural and spontaneous as it is for the hungry to ask for bread, or for the drowning to cry out for help.

We may therefore say of prayer in religion what was just said of prayer in general. It is the fit, natural, and spontaneous utterance of those who need help, when in the presence, or in the supposed presence, of One who can help them if He will. Under these circumstances, to pray is as natural as to breathe. Under these circumstances, to restrain prayer is not to follow our nature, but to do violence to it; so that all occasion for argument is with those who neglect or withhold prayer. In other words, the question with us should not be, Why pray? but, Why not pray?

But if prayer is so natural and spontaneous an act, it would seem to follow that it must be universal. And is it not so in fact? One of the best informed of the pagans has said: "Survey the face of the globe. You may find whole tribes and nations without fortified places, without letters, without a regular magistracy or fixed habitations, without property or the use of money; but never one without a God, without altars, without prayers."* Neither was this a mere state contrivance for state purposes,—the craft by which a few would subdue and control the many. We have the testimony of several of the early Christian fathers to the general prevalence throughout the pagan world of a disposition among the common people to appeal when in trouble or alarm to a higher Power. It is also remarkable that in the deepest emotions of their minds they never directed their invocations to their false gods, but employed such expressions as these: "As truly as God lives!" or, "God help me!" Moreover, at such times they did not turn their eyes to the Capitol, but lifted them to Heaven.*

And how is it at the present day? Far am I from supposing that piety, considered as a predominant or abiding trait of character, the piety required by the New Testament, is universal or general. But where will you find a man who never prays! You may find men without morality, without natural affection, without any proper or steady faith; you may find plenty of doubters and deniers, scoffers and blasphemers; but where will you find one who never prayed! Throughout the wide world, where will you find one whom the consciousness of peril, anguish, impotence, or sin never betrayed into some such ejaculation as this: "God help me!" or "God have mercy on me!" Yet all these are of the nature of prayer. I do not think I should be very extravagant were I to assert, that it is as impossible to find a man who never prayed, as to find one who never shed a tear.

Still some may think that such prayers, however natural and common, are worthless, are not proper prayers, as they do not spring from gratitude, but from a sense of our needs and our helplessness. But why this objection? What better or more suitable spirit is there, from which prayer, as prayer, can proceed, than from this very consciousness of our needs and our helplessness. Here indeed breaks upon us, as it seems to me, one of the most important views to be taken of those trials and afflictions which bring man's insufficiency to light. They make us feel, what is true whether we feel it or no, that we are nothing without God, and so lead us to God as our only refuge and stay. Other wise purposes are answered, I doubt not, through our exposure to trouble and calamity; yet none of these are of so direct and high benefit as the one we are now considering, impressing on the human mind, as it does, a sense of entire dependence on God, and making prayer to be the natural and only resort.

What man is there whose own experience does not come in aid of this doctrine? Those especially who have felt the crushing weight of a great sorrow, will they not testify that they found no peace until they gave over struggling with Providence, until they gave over struggling altogether; until they yielded themselves unreservedly to the Divine disposal, something whispering that it was to bring about this happy state of mind that the sorrow was sent? There are prayers, as every one knows, which are not prayers; but this can hardly be said of the earnest cry which is wrung from men in their extremity, when every other hope has fled, and they cast themselves wholly on God. I cannot help thinking that many a solemn-sounding litany has been chanted by priestly lips in consecrated places, to waste itself on the air, while the whole ear of heaven was intent on some poor sailor's "God help me!" as it went up amidst the howlings of the tempest from the parting wreck.

Again, it may be objected that these natural, spontaneous, and often ejaculatory appeals to God, when we are in difficulty or trouble, amount to nothing as they are not founded in reason, but in some illusion of the imagination. "Forgetting," such objectors will say, "the essential distinction between the Divine and human modes of acting, we call upon God, as we should call on a man if he were near, and expect the Divine interference as we should expect that of a friend, of a father, if he were standing by." And why not? Either you must say that God is not our friend and father, which is to deny the truth of religion; or that, though our friend and father, he will not act as if he were, which is to make it of no importance to us whether religion is true or not. Why are we glad to be assured that God is our friend and father? Simply and solely because we thence infer that he will be a friend and father to us; that is to say, do for us what a friend and father would in like circumstances. Undoubtedly we should guard against the not uncommon error of pushing too far the analogy between the human and Divine modes of conduct. For example, we must not expect from God many things which we might expect from the folly or weakness of a friend or father; but certainly we may expect from God what we should expect from the wisdom and goodness of a friend and father. If these titles when applied to God do not mean this, I would fain ask what they do mean. Is it not plain, not only that they mean this, but that they can mean nothing else? God is not our friend in the same way in which a man is our friend, that is, by mutual sympathy and reciprocity of favors; neither is he our father in the literal sense of that word. The terms are not intended to denote a physical, but a moral relationship. That is to say, we call God our friend and father, because, and only because we suppose he will do for us what the wisdom and goodness of a friend and father would do for us in like circumstances. Calling God our friend and father means this, or it means nothing; it means this, or it does not afford us the shadow of ground either of comfort or trust.

Accordingly, the Scriptures, both the Old Testament and the New, abound in instances in which the paternal character of God is expressly set forth as a reason for expecting his help in time of need, and especially in answer to prayer. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him; for he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust." "Can a woman forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the son of her womb? Yea, they may forget; yet will I not forget thee." The parable of the Prodigal Son is also a beautiful and most impressive illustration of what may be expected from the paternal relationship of God, showing that no degree of ingratitude and sin will shut his ear against our prayers, should we ever afterwards turn to him with an humble and contrite heart. And so our text: "What man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him?"

The first practical lesson to be gathered from what has been said is, that we should cherish this natural and spontaneous disposition to look upon our Heavenly Father as always near, watching over our conduct, and ready with all needed succors. A man is not religious because he believes in the existence of God, but because he recognizes and feels His continual presence and agency. The Epicureans did not deny the existence of the gods; but they denied the fact of a Providence; they denied that the gods had any care or pity for mortals, and so subverted the foundations of all religion in the soul. Not much less fatal to worship and a devout habit of mind is a doctrine held by some at the present day; namely, that God made the world, and then abandoned it to the action and control of physical laws, retiring himself from all supervision and interference in human affairs. The ground and life of prayer depend on our believing, not merely that there was a God once, the Creator of the world, but that there is one now and here;—a living and personal God, witnessing everything which we do, and hearing everything which we say.

Men, I repeat it, are not religious in proportion to the strength, the clearness, or the soundness of their faith, but in proportion to the hold which this faith, whatever it may be, has gained over their feelings and imagination. A serious and spiritually minded man, though of but little faith, is often more religious than one who never knew what it was to doubt, the difference in conviction being more than made up by the difference in feeling and imagination. I do not mean that we should look to the feelings and imagination as sources of truth. To find out what is true, we should use our reason; but having found it out, if we would give effect to it, we must call in the aid of the feelings and the imagination, by which alone what is true to the understanding is converted into a present reality to the heart and the life. Reason may assure us of the existence of "Him who is invisible;" but this is not enough. This conclusion may be accepted by the intellect alone, in which case we shall hold it without being affected by it. In order to be affected by it, and to become personally what it requires, we must live, we must act, we must enjoy, we must endure, "as seeing Him who is invisible," which cannot be done without the help of the feelings and the imagination.

Let me add, that this is hardly more necessary to religion than to a high and strict virtue. A great deal too much has been said about the self-sufficiency and the all-sufficiency of virtue. Virtue with religion makes a man contented and happy, I allow; but virtue without religion only makes a man more painfully alive to the unequal distributions of this world, and the hopelessness of oppressed innocence. Besides, what security have we for the thoroughness and endurance of such virtue without religion? Little does the world know about the thoughts of those who are accounted upright, and who generally are so; little does it know what they do, or are tempted to do, when withdrawn from the public gaze; little does it know what the best of them would be tempted to think and do, if they could divest themselves of the secret impression that the eye of the Invisible Witness is upon them at all times.

Another practical lesson to be gathered from what has been said is, that we should not only look upon our Heavenly Father as always near, but accustom ourselves to make known our requests to him, asking that we may receive, and thus cultivating a direct and habitual intercourse with him. I am not ignorant of the speculative difficulties respecting prayer, by which some minds are troubled; but it is a mistake to suppose that these difficulties are generally at the bottom of their neglect of prayer. What hinders a vast majority of such men from praying is the want of a devout habit of mind. With their present dispositions, nine out of ten would not pray, habitually and from the heart, even if these difficulties were removed; and nine out of ten, if they could be induced to cultivate a devout habit of mind, would soon begin to pray notwithstanding these difficulties. The worst that can be said of these difficulties is, that they supply the unspiritually disposed with an excuse or pretext for not so much as trying or caring to cultivate a devout habit of mind.

To this some may reply: We have no objection to a devout habit of mind; but we think this can be cultivated and evinced by acknowledging God in all his ways, by submitting to every affliction as appointed in mercy, by referring every blessing to his gift,—in short, by religious thoughtfulness and meditation, quite as well as by selfish importunities under the name of prayer. If I find difficulty in dealing with those who make this objection, it is because I find difficulty in believing it to be made in good faith. Is it true, do you think, that those who take this ground against prayer are among those who are most addicted to religious thoughtfulness and meditation? Nor is this all. I can hardly conceive it to be possible that a devout man should become familiar with the thought of God as a loving Father, and accustom himself to recognize his constant presence and agency, without being often irresistibly impelled, by a sense of insufficiency or sin, to cry out for help or pardon. As it has been justly said: “To repeat desires in our minds, being at the same time sensible that the Supreme Disposer of our lot stands by and observes them, without ever directing them to Him, or looking to Him for the accomplishment of them, — this implies a neglect of the Giver of all good, so repugnant to the sentiments of the human heart, and so criminal, as to be absolutely incompatible with right dispositions.”* To ask whether a man can be religious without prayer, is like asking whether a man can be sociable without the use of speech. It is bringing together incongruous, irreconcilable ideas. Besides, for other reasons, I do not admit that any form of religious thoughtfulness or meditation is as likely to bring about a devout habit of mind, as prayer. The very posture which the soul assumes in prayer opens it and predisposes it to the reception of Divine influences. In private prayer especially, supposing it real and not mere form or routine, when the soul is alone with its Maker, — this is felt to be no time nor place for dissembling, or vain parade, or side purposes. Conscious that the eye of the Omniscient is upon him, and that no record is made of what he is doing but that which will be sealed up until the judgment of the great day, — if man is ever sincere and in earnest, if he is ever touched by a sense of his relationship to the Divinity, if his heart is ever warmed and melted by the spirit of humble and childlike trust, it must be then.

* Price's Four Dissertations, Fifth Edition, p. 282.

There is one more practical lesson to be gathered from what has been said. We are not only to cultivate the spirit and the habit of prayer, but we are to do it from belief in the direct efficacy of prayer. I have just alluded to the difficulties on this subject which exist in some minds. Time would fail me to speak of them in detail, but they are mainly resolvable into this: that God will do for us what is fit and best, whether we ask him or not. True; but is it not plain that it may be fit and best for us to receive many things in answer to humble and devout prayer, which it would not be fit and best for us to receive on any other condition? Besides, these are difficulties to trouble a deist; and we are not deists. They ought not to trouble a Christian. The worst that can be said is, that, with our very inadequate conceptions of the Divine nature and government, reason cannot see how prayer can alter the course of events. Still the believer knows that the fact is revealed, and insisted on as much perhaps as any other in the New Testament; and under these circumstances the misgivings of his bewildered and baffled understanding are overruled by the sublime principle of faith. Moreover, these doubts about the efficacy of prayer do not originate in the best parts of our nature; neither do they manifest themselves in the best moods of the soul; they are born of our selfish and worldly experiences, and that almost exclusive culture of the understanding which leads to unspiritual views of nature and God.

Most persons find no difficulty in believing that prayer exerts a happy and desirable influence on the worshipper himself; but even this can hardly be, if it is generally understood that this is all. Indeed, I cannot help thinking that conscience itself would dissuade many from resorting to prayer, if brought to look on it as no better than a kind of well-meant cheat which we practise on ourselves for its moral uses. Prayer, to have much effect on ourselves, must be believed to have an effect on God. It is too solemn a transaction by far to be made use of as a kind of spiritual strategy. No; make not our prayers to seem one thing and be another. Strike not our devotions dead by the sceptical sophism that they can only have an effect on ourselves. They will have an effect on God; for he has said that they will, and the promise has been ratified and confirmed in the experience of holy and devout men in all ages. They will have an effect on God, for He who is "in the bosom of the Father" has said that they will. "Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find." Again it is said: "Let us come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need." And more affectingly still in the words of the text: "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him." Wherefore, "Be careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God: and the peace of God, which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts and minds through Jesus Christ."

RELIGION AS AFFECTED BY THE PROGRESS OF THE PHYSICAL SCIENCES.

AND THERE SHALL BE SIGNS IN THE SUN, AND IN THE MOON, AND IN THE STARS; AND UPON THE EARTH DISTRESS OF NATIONS AND PERPLEXITY; THE SEA AND THE WAVES ROARING; MEN'S HEARTS FAILING THEM FOR FEAR, AND FOR LOOKING AFTER THOSE THINGS WHICH ARE COMING ON THE EARTH; FOR THE POWERS OF HEAVEN SHALL BE SHAKEN. — Luke xxi. 25, 26.

IN the language of Scripture the overthrow and destruction of nations are represented under images borrowed from unusual and terrific appearances in nature. We need not suppose that the Prophets, in resorting to such expressions, really meant that the physical phenomena here referred to would attend or usher in the events foretold. The expressions were not intended as descriptive and historical, but merely as suggestive and emblematic of the impending calamity.

But in the early popular superstitions of every country a mysterious connection is supposed really to exist between remarkable appearances in nature, especially when in the heavens, and remarkable changes in the affairs of men. On this fanciful idea arose that mighty superstructure of omens and portents and prodigies which plays so important a part in the religions of the ancient world. A day of unusual darkness, the shooting of meteors noticeable either for their number or magnitude, a singular conjunction of the planets, the appearance of a comet, or an eclipse of the sun, was sure to be attended by "distress of nations and perplexity," "men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which were coming on the earth."

If the question should be asked, Why are not the multitude affected in the same way now? — the answer is on everybody's tongue. It is because the wonders of science have gradually and imperceptibly expelled the marvels of superstition. Who now believes in the pompous trifling of astrology? Who now thinks to read in the heavens the fate of nations, or of individuals? No doubt the sudden apparition of a comet, an earthquake, a total eclipse of the sun, or any other unusual and startling occurrence, will still arrest attention, and fill men with awe; but they are no longer looked upon as prodigies, as omens or portents, or as being in any sense preternatural. On the contrary, they are known to be resolvable into the operation of the same system of physical laws according to which the fire burns and rivers flow, the flowers expand and an apple falls to the ground.

Here, however, several questions arise, by which thoughtful and serious minds have been troubled not a little. Granting that the progress of science tends to lessen the number of popular illusions and mistakes, is there no reason to fear that it also tends to lessen the number of popular interests and securities? The intellect will doubtless be a gainer by it; but is there no danger that the imagination and the sentiments will suffer? Superstition will be rooted up; is there no ground for the apprehension that religion itself is also gradually losing its hold on the public mind, and from the same cause?

The writings of men who are distrustful of the times abound in doubts and misgivings of this kind, — so much the more mischievous because barely hinted at. To be forever asking sceptical questions as to the drift of human thought, and to stop there, can answer no good purpose. Let us, therefore, take up some of these inquiries, and pursue them as far as the narrow limits of a single discourse will permit.

In the first place, is it true that the progress of science threatens to leave us with nothing to wonder at? There are those who seem to think that, in proportion as the processes of nature are explained, that is, referred to established and known laws, so that they can be foreseen and predicted, everything must become tame and commonplace;—no objects to call forth some of the finest and noblest properties of our nature; no play of the imagination: man will look down on everything; he will look up to nothing. But it is because these alarmists make wonder to be of one kind only, when in fact it is of two kinds. There is a stolid wonder and an intelligent wonder; the wonder of bewilderment, and the wonder of admiration; wonder at what we do not understand, and wonder at what we do understand, and see to be so true and simple and perfect. Undoubtedly a savage will stand aghast at appearances in the heavens, which, if he were better instructed, would not affect him at all, or affect him in a very different way. But this is not the sole, or the highest form of wonder. What is most likely to fill a thinking mind with astonishment and awe, is not the disorder, but the order, of the universe; not the occasional convulsions of the elements, but the fact that a few simple laws reign throughout all this apparent diversity and confusion, and give unity and stability to the whole.

Still many will insist that a scientific view of nature is not a religious view of nature. And this is true; but only in the sense in which it is also true, that a scientific view of the Bible is not a religious view of the Bible. A scientific view of nature is not a religious view of nature, any more than it is a poetical view of nature; but this does not assume or imply that it stands in the way of either. A religious view of nature supposes two things; first, a heart alive to religious impressions, and, secondly, an eye to see in the visible universe the presence and activity of "Him who is invisible." And these, of course, do not originate in a science of nature, nor in a science of anything, but in our moral constitution, in religious culture, and the grace of God.

Let us try to make the proper and necessary discriminations on this subject. The whole discussion about the bearing of scientific study on religious character has been needlessly embarrassed and perplexed by the false issues which have been raised and argued. No enlightened advocate of education will pretend that the physical sciences, or that any science, even the science of theology, will make a man truly religious. Scientific men, to become truly religious, must become so in the same way in which other men do;—that is, by availing themselves of the means necessary to induce a devout habit of mind.

The point in dispute is therefore narrowed down to this: are scientific men less likely than others to resort to these means? or do they resort to them under less favorable circumstances? In other words, to be still more explicit and direct, the whole inquiry resolves itself into two questions. In the first place, is there anything in a scientific study of nature to hinder a man from becoming religious in the usual way? And, in the second place, supposing him to be religious, is there anything in a scientific view of nature to hinder him from taking, at the same time, a religious view of nature?

Before taking up the first of these questions, let us glance, for a moment, at the facts in the case. From the language often used on this subject one might presume, that nearly all the scepticism in the world can be directly traced to the progress of physical science. But it is not so. The great irreligious movements, so far as they have originated in study of any kind, have originated, for the most part, in the study, not of physics, but of metaphysics. So it was with the Greek sophists. So it was with English deism in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. And so pre-eminently with German pantheism, which is the offspring, not of German physics, but of German metaphysics. Even the materialism, so common among the French physicists of the last generation, was not the consequence of studying nature in itself considered, but of studying nature in the faith, and under the lead of a materialistic philosophy, that is to say, of a bad metaphysics. Moreover the religious character of a multitude of scientific men has never been questioned. Such names as Kepler and Newton, Boyle, Pascal, and Leibnitz, and a host of others like them, ought at least to save the physical sciences from being singled out for the reproach of necessarily tending to infidelity. And how is it in England and this country, at the present day?

Of course it would be absurd to say, that every student of nature is a religious man. But what evidence is there that the class itself has not, at this moment, its full proportion of such men, if compared with any other class as exclusively devoted to purely intellectual pursuits? We must not presume that a scientific man lives and dies without any regard for religion, merely because he does not see fit to introduce it into his scientific publications, or thinks, perhaps, with Bacon, that final causes have nothing to do with physics. Few names eminent in modern science are so frequently claimed on the side of infidelity as that of Laplace: it is instructive, therefore, to learn what his final sentiments on this subject were, from the following record of a conversation, which an English scholar of note had with him not long before his death. "Among other subjects he inquired into the nature of our endowments, and our course of academic study; which I explained to him at some length. He then dwelt earnestly on the religious character of our endowments, and added, as nearly as I can translate his words, 'I think this right; and on this point I should deprecate any great organic changes in your system; for I have lived long enough to know, what I did not at one time believe, that no society can be upheld in happiness and honor without the sentiments of religion.'''*

Let us now return to the question, Is there any thing in the scientific study of nature to hinder a man from becoming religious, in the only way in which any man can expect to become so?

Nobody understands, I suppose, that the scientific study of nature, alone considered, will make a man religious, any more than the scientific study of language or of law. Religion, I repeat it, is not the fruit of a scientific study of anything;—not even of theology or the Bible. For this reason we are to be neither surprised nor troubled on finding that there have been eminent theologians and Biblical critics, who were not religious men. Why should they have been so for that reason alone? that is to say, merely for knowing how a passage in the Greek Testament is to be read, or how religious systems are to be framed and defended?—in one word, merely because they are good linguists or good logicians? Because a man is a good linguist or a good logician, it does not follow that he is a good Christian. Those who are fond of insisting, and with truth, that religion is not a distinct and foreign substance, to be patched on the character, must remember, nevertheless, that it is a distinct development of character; that it may be, or may not be, developed with the rest of the character; and furthermore, that its development calls for distinct and appropriate means.

What is to be religious? I do not now ask, how a man begins to be religious? for this would bring up a multitude of unsettled questions. But what I ask is simply this, let a man begin to be religious as he may, when can he be said to have become religious, in the sense of having a religious character? I answer: when he shows himself to possess a devout habit of mind, and not before. How then, I ask again, is a devout habit of mind to be acquired and maintained? Obviously, so far at least as it depends on human means, in the same way in which all other habits are acquired and maintained; that is, by a repetition of the thoughts, the feelings, the actions, which go to make up the habit. Hence the institution of stated times and modes of worship, the main purpose of which is to keep up in men of every walk in life a religious consciousness, that is to say, an habitual sense of the presence and agency of God everywhere and in everything. As means to the same end, we may also mention faithfulness to the duty of secret prayer, the reading of devotional books full of the inspiration of a religious genius, and especially, of the Bible,—not as a critic, but for its practical and devotional uses; and last, though not least, the society of religious men, and well-written lives of the religious men of other countries and other times, considered as the means of quickening and enlarging our religious sympathies. Common sense, as well as the Scriptures, teach us that it is only in some such way that a religious habit of mind can be generated and upheld,—I do not say, in this, or that condition of life, but in any condition of life: in the scholar, the artisan, the day-laborer; in the man of business, and in the professional man; in the artist, and in the man of science. To expect it to be generated and upheld in any other way, is to expect an effect without the cause, a state of mind without the antecedents, the preparation on which it depends.

Now I insist that the principal, if not the sole danger religion has to apprehend from the physical sciences, even in those most devoted to them, is to be found, not in the sciences as such, but in the fact that they are apt to take up and engross the whole mind. A man may become a mathematician or a naturalist, and nothing else, just as he may become a lawyer, or a merchant, or a mechanic, and nothing else,—that is, to the forgetfulness, or at least to the serious neglect, of other cares and duties, and especially of his own social and moral and religious culture. But it would be neither reasonable nor fair, in such cases, to ascribe the evil to the nature of the pursuits;—it comes from exclusive devotion to them, and comes whatever may be the pursuit.

There is nothing, then, in the scientific study of nature to hinder men from resorting to the usual and necessary means of becoming religious, or to prevent these means from being effectual. And this brings us to the second question: Supposing a man to be religious, is there anything in a scientific view of nature to hinder him from taking, at the same time, a religious view of nature?

Science has to do with laws, and with phenomena as they illustrate, fall under, or help to establish these laws. An impression, I believe, prevails in some quarters, that these laws, in a scientific mind, take the place of God, and exclude him from the universe. But is it so?

Need I repeat here what has been said so often? Even if it were possible to resolve every phenomenon of nature into what are called the laws of nature, it would not be to take a single step towards dispensing with the necessity of an All-sustaining Energy, and an All-controlling Mind. For, in the first place, the existence of these laws would still have to be accounted for; and, in the second place, supposing them to exist, they are not a force; they are not the proper cause of anything; they are not an agent, but only the rules, or conditions by which the real Agent is pleased to govern himself; and this Agent is God. Nay, who does not see how much less inconsistency there would be in supposing the universe the work of chance, if it were not governed by general laws, and according to a fixed plan; because, though in this case we should still want a power to account for the motion, we should not want an intelligence to account for regular and concerted motion. Indeed, the moment we fully recognize the fact that the world is governed by laws; that order, adaptation, unity are everywhere apparent; that there are unmistakable traces of a plan, extending to all things, comprehending all things, — there springs up in the mind, unbidden and irresistibly, the conviction of purpose and thought, that is, of an Intelligent Author. Thus what to the scientific mind are but the laws of nature, become to the same mind, if religious, what, in the expressive and sublime language of Scripture, are called “the Ways of God.”

I say, "to the same mind, if religious"; for I must remind you once more, that precisely here is the great difficulty, not only in men of science, but in all men devoted to intellectual pursuits. As a general rule, I believe that men of action are more inclined to religion, than men of study; and the reason is obvious. It is not, as some would interpret it, because a superior education has raised the latter above religion, but because a one-sided education has made them incapable of it, or, at any rate, comparatively unsusceptible to it. It is because their habits and predispositions lead them to look at religion under a speculative point of view, where all its difficulties, and almost none of its chief attractions, are found. Be this, however, as it may, one thing is clear: a man must be religious in himself, before he can be expected to carry religion into his daily work, whether of body or mind. Unless a man will take some pains to acquire a devout habit of mind, in other words, unless he will take some pains to quicken and develop that part of his nature to which religion is addressed, it is certain that no amount of physical knowledge will make him properly sensible to the manifestations of God in the material world. He may open the book of nature where he will, and it will be to him, under a religious point of view, a blank page; while to those who have not neglected their con sciences and souls in the exclusive culture of the intellect, and who therefore read it with a prepared mind, it will be written all over with lessons of adoration and praise, of solemn awe and humble trust.

Nay, more ; these "laws of nature," from which so much danger to religion is apprehended, — when rightly viewed, they not only do not remove God further from us, but have the effect to bring him strangely, startlingly near. They not only prove arrangement, contrivance, a plan, — that is to say, connected and intelligent thought, — but, in proportion as we succeed in comprehending them, they enable us to enter into that thought. The human mind is conscious of being where the Divine Mind has been before, — perhaps I ought to say, where the Divine Mind is now. And besides, a world not governed by fixed laws would be a chaos, not a creation. Accordingly it is only by tracing these laws that we can attain to a conception of a Creative Mind, and put ourselves into communication with it. Nothing is to be feared, everything is to be hoped, from the progress of scientific culture, provided only that moral and spiritual culture goes along with it, hand in hand. To a religious mind God is best seen, not in that part of nature which is least understood, but in that part of nature which is best understood.

Let me add, that whoever begins by thus recognizing in nature a personal and living God, will not be likely to stop there. There is nothing in the study of the laws of nature by a devout mind to exclude the idea of a Revelation, though this Revelation be a miracle, and authenticated by miracles. God acts in and through laws; not however from necessity, but because, as a general rule, it is obviously important and indispensable to the safety and happiness of his children, who otherwise would not know what to depend upon. If then an exigency should arise, in which the safety and happiness of his children require a deviation from the usual order of things, from his ordinary rule of action, in all such cases the rule must give way to the principle which dictated the rule. There is no inconsistency or contradiction here; no change of purpose; no disregard even for law, for he still obeys the law of all laws, the law of his own nature, which is, to do in every instance what is wisest and best.

Moreover, what we know of religion by the study of nature has the effect to create in us an earnest longing to know more. A curiosity is awakened, which is not appeased; problems are suggested, which are not solved; a mysterious hand is laid on the veil, and we wait in humble, awful expectation to see that veil lifted up. Once believe, no matter on what evidence, in a personal and living God, and that he is a loving and tender Father of all men, and after that, the wonder is, not that he has interposed at times, but that he does not interpose oftener. Thus it is, that the recognition of God in nature prepares the way for the recognition of God in Christ. We accept the declaration, "God, who at sundry times and in divers manners spake in times past unto the fathers by the prophets, has in these last days spoken unto us by his Son." How then can we resist the appeal? "See that ye refuse not him that speaketh. For if they escaped not who refused him that spake on earth, much more shall not we escape, if we turn away from him that speaketh from heaven."

CONSCIENCE.

AND PAUL, EARNESTLY BEHOLDING THE COUNCIL, SAID: MEN AND BRETHREN, I HAVE LIVED IN ALL GOOD CONSCIENCE BEFORE GOD UNTIL THIS DAY. — Acts xxiii. 1.

THE Apostle Paul began his defence before his countrymen with this noble declaration, and though but his own testimony in his own favor, it is abundantly confirmed by what we know of his character from other sources. We have every reason to believe that he was what is called “a conscientious man” before he became a Christian, as well as afterwards. By his own confession, he “was before a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and injurious; but I obtained mercy,” he adds, “because I did it ignorantly in unbelief.” Again he says: “I verily thought with myself, that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth.”

But if it be conceded that Paul was a conscientious man before his conversion, the question very naturally arises, How then can his conversion be said to have made him a better man? I answer, in one word, — because it made his conscience a better conscience. A man may be no more observant of conscience than formerly; but he may have a better conscience to observe.

Nothing has done so much to perplex men's speculations about conscience as certain fundamental mistakes respecting its proper nature and functions.

In the first place, conscience is not a law, but a faculty; not the decision pronounced in a particular case, but the faculty which pronounces the decision. As reflective beings, we are constrained to endure our own review of our own conduct, including our dispositions and intentions. Such, also, is our mental constitution, that we cannot knowingly do ill without feeling that we deserve ill, or knowingly do well without feeling that we deserve well. Hence we are said to have not merely a sensitive and intellectual nature, but also a moral nature; and the peculiar faculty by which this moral nature manifests itself, as far as it is manifested, is called conscience.

Again; this faculty is susceptible of instruction and improvement, like other faculties of the human mind; like the understanding, for example, or the taste. Of course, I do not mean that conscience is wholly a factitious thing, that education makes it, any more than it makes the understanding or the taste. Every faculty, properly so called, depends for its existence on the original constitution of the human mind, and, considered under this point of view, must be regarded as "the inspiration of the Almighty." But then it is also true, that every such faculty, and conscience among the rest, depends mainly for its development, for both the manner and degree of its development, on education, including under this term all the influences which are intentionally or unintentionally brought to bear upon it. And this being the case, who does not see that one man's conscience may be better than another's, just as one man's understanding or taste may be better than another's, and again that the same man's conscience may be better at one time than at another?

There is also another important distinction to be made in respect to conscience. Its authority is sometimes said to be supreme and final. And so it is, in a certain sense; that is to say, it is supreme and final over every other kind of human motive and inducement; should a conflict arise, our sense of what is right ought to prevail, in all cases, over our sense of what is expedient or agreeable. But the authority of conscience is not supreme and final in such a sense as to forbid conscience itself from revising, and, if need be, reversing, its own past decisions. I may appeal at any time from my conscience less instructed to my conscience more instructed, and under these circumstances what was right to me yesterday, may become wrong to me to-day; and what is right to me to-day, may become wrong to me to-morrow. Indeed, it is hardly proper to speak of this as something which may be; it ought to be, and must be, as men advance in wisdom and virtue. All will agree, I suppose, that self-culture, including moral progress, is a duty; and also that one of the most essential parts of this duty is the duty of clearing up our conceptions of right and wrong, especially in reference to the more complicated rules of duty, and to the application of these rules to the more complicated affairs of life. Preachers may say what they will, still the fact is indisputable, that good men, even the best men, are often at a loss what to do,—at a loss what course to take. The perplexity here referred to does not arise, certainly not in all cases, from unwillingness to face the difficulty, or to make the sacrifices, attending the right course, but from real ignorance or doubt as to which is the right course. This, to be sure, is not likely to happen in simple and plain cases of duty; but simple and plain cases of duty are not met with in life as often as they are in books. In life things are jumbled together very unscientifically. More than half our duties relate to matters only indirectly connected with morals; or to measures, customs, or institutions, where the moral question is so mixed up with other questions, as to make it easy for us to deceive ourselves, or be deceived by others, and easier still to take up with the current opinion without examination. Hence our need not only of a conscience, but of an enlightened conscience,—of a conscience willing to revise its old decisions under new lights, and to correct them if necessary.

But if conscience itself is an improvable faculty, and if, in its legitimate action to-day, it can revise and reverse its own decisions of yesterday, the question naturally arises, Is there anything in conscience which is fixed and absolute?

I answer, Yes. The things which are fixed and absolute in conscience—that is to say, the things which are the same in all consciences, and the same in every conscience at all times—would seem to be these three. In the first place, all consciences make a distinction between actions as being right or wrong; secondly, the notion of right, as such, or of wrong, as such, is identical to all minds; and, thirdly, all concur in the feeling that they ought to do what they believe to be right.

So far conscience is fixed, absolute, infallible. But let us understand ourselves. In saying that all consciences make a distinction between actions, classifying some as right and others as wrong, we do not mean that all make the same distinction in the sense of making the same classification. The simple conception of right and wrong is identical to all minds; when, however, we are called upon to apply this conception to complicated actions and dispositions, nothing hinders us from differing from one another, and even from ourselves at different times, on the question, under which head a particular action or disposition, a particular institution or measure, is to be classed. Strictly speaking, we never differ as to the distinction between right and wrong, but only as to the application of this distinction in certain cases; and here, too, the difference arises, not from our not understanding the distinction between right and wrong, but for the most part from our not understanding the measures, the actions, or the states of mind to be judged.

Moreover, though all concur, as I have said, in feeling that we ought to do what is right, nothing hinders that this feeling should exist in different minds, and in the same mind at different times, in very different degrees; — in some hardly appreciable; in others, so intense as to make the pains and pleasures of conscience their chief happiness or misery. Still the feeling itself never changes its essential character. Under no circumstances whatever can the moral sentiments with which acknowledged virtue and vice are respectively regarded be made to change places. We may approve a wrong action, mistaking it for a right one; we may also incline to a wrong action, notwithstanding it is wrong, from motives of interest or self-indulgence; but no perversion of nature or education can make us feel that we ought to do what we know to be wrong, or that we ought not to do what we know to be right.

I dwell on these distinctions, because I would not be thought to suppose or imply, in speaking of conscience as an improvable faculty, that conscience is wholly factitious,—the creature of circumstances, of training, of caprice. I believe no such thing. If there is a mutable, there is also an immutable element in conscience. In its principle and essence, conscience is not an arbitrary thing; it is not something which experience and education put into men, but something which they bring out, by bringing out his moral nature,—though, in different men, in very different degrees and proportions. The conscience of each individual is a special development of our common moral nature;—a more or less perfect development, but still a development of our common moral nature, and therefore always manifesting, more or less perfectly, the essential and unchanging properties of that nature, and so far always the same. It is only necessary that we should avoid confounding a man's conscience with his moral nature, just as we avoid confounding a man's actual taste with his æsthetic nature. They are two things distinct in themselves, and always to be kept so in our thoughts. A man's moral nature is his innate capacity of moral discrimination; it is part and parcel of our common human nature, and, for anything known to the contrary, is the same in all men. But this moral nature, this innate capacity of moral discrimination, may be wholly latent, as in the case of infants, who cannot be said to have any consciences, though they have a moral nature; and it is more or less so in adults. What we insist upon is, that a man's conscience, properly so-called, does not include that part of his moral nature which is still latent; it consists of that part only which has been put forth, which has come out into consciousness and activity. In other words, the conscience of an individual is, as I have said, a special development of our common moral nature, more or less true, more or less complete, but not likely to be identical in any two persons.

And so the Scriptures. They speak, indeed, of conscience as "showing," as "bearing witness to," as revealing, but not as being "the work of the law written in men's hearts." While they represent some as acting from "a pure conscience" and "a good conscience," they say of others, "But even their mind and conscience is defiled;" and again, "Having their conscience seared with a hot iron." They also ask, "Yea, and why even of yourselves judge ye not what is right?" — clearly implying two things; first, that our consciences may judge amiss, and, secondly, that they often do so from defects which we might ourselves supply by reflection and discipline.

I return, therefore, to the position taken in the beginning: whether we consult reason, or experience, or Scripture, we come to the conclusion, that conscience is an improvable faculty. It is a mistake to suppose that all men share a common conscience; they share, and perhaps equally, a common moral nature, but this common moral nature becomes conscience, as the very name imports, only in so far as it is put forth into consciousness and activity, only in so far as it is developed and made effective in the individual. Each man's conscience is a special development of our common moral nature; and each man's duty in respect to it is, to take care that this special development shall be more and more complete, and more and more effective; in short, that he may have a better conscience to obey, and obey it more faithfully.

It only remains to consider the means and appliances by which this twofold improvement, this progress, at the same time, in conscience and in conscientiousness, may be promoted and secured.

The first condition is, a habit of attending to the moral aspects and bearings of things, and especially of our own dispositions and conduct ; in one word, moral thoughtfulness. This would be true, even if we started in life with a conscience ready formed. We are affected by what we at present know or believe, only in so far as we attend to it; and hence an apparent anomaly often noticed. Some men are a great deal better, and others a great deal worse than their principles, meaning thereby the moral and religious principles really held by them, but not attended to. And this remark applies with tenfold force, where the principles, as in the case of a man's conscience, are not only to be held, but developed. Why is it that among savages the animal instincts and passions are developed so disproportionately? Because there the animal instincts and passions are almost the only things thought of, or appealed to. Why is it that during long periods of moral and social degeneracy almost every manly and unselfish quality of human nature seems to die out? It is simply because these qualities are not put forth; and they are not put forth because they are not cared for or appreciated. And how are the great epochs of awakening and reform to be explained? Simply by the fact that, somehow or other, the public attention is thoroughly aroused to the public needs, often by a sense of the very depths of the public infamy and despair. At first the thought seizes hold of here and there a leading mind ; gradually it becomes the ever-present thought of the community, of the age ; and human nature reasserts its noblest qualities once more. Why is it, that on some points, such, for example, as peace, temperance, and human rights, our consciences are evidently in advance of the consciences of our fathers, while on many others it is equally evident that the reverse is true ? Simply and solely because the former points are more attended to by us : we are more alive to them ; they are more in our thoughts. It is moral thoughtfulness, taking the special direction given to it by the age.

A second necessary condition of the twofold moral progress required — of progress in both conscience and conscientiousness — is found in a determination to do right, cost what it may ; in other words, to moral thoughtfulness we must add an invincible moral purpose. We often hear it said, that men mean well enough when they start in life, even though afterwards led astray by temptation ; but this remark is true only in a very limited and qualified sense. I do not suppose that many start in life with a determination to become murderers, robbers, rogues, or drunkards ; their error consists, not in starting with a bad moral purpose, but with no moral purpose ; at least, with none that is controlling and effectual. They are looking to ease, pleasure, success : the best that can be said of them under a moral point of view is, that they hope and perhaps expect to gain their objects without falling into crime. Not one man in a thousand, in choosing his profession, or laying down his plan of life, is influenced solely or mainly by a purpose to make himself as perfect as possible in the sight of God.

And this is not all. Much of what passes for fidelity to conscience is nothing but fidelity to prejudice or to party. A man is educated in a set of principles, which may be right or may be wrong, or, more probably still, partly right and partly wrong, or he is converted to such a set of principles, and afterwards deems it sufficient to be true to these principles; as if duty were nothing but an inexorable consistency. The double progress incumbent on all men makes it necessary for us to put to ourselves, at least at every important turn of our affairs, not one question only, but two, — Am I faithful to my principles? and, Are my principles what they should be? Neglect of the latter is as much of an immorality as neglect of the former. Remember, the moral purpose, of which I speak as being at the foundation of a good life, is not a purpose to obey our consciences as they are, whether well or ill-advised, but a purpose to do right; and this involves the purpose, to endeavor to find out what is right, that we may do it; and this, again, the still rarer and more difficult purpose, to bring to the subject that fairness and earnestness of mind which is indispensable to practical wisdom ; and, above all, to shun those illusions, deceits, self-indulgences and sins, by which so many are given over to a reprobate mind, " to believe a lie."

The progress insisted on in this discourse supposes another condition ; namely, that we not only obey conscience, but obey it as an echo of the Divine will : in other words, to moral thoughtfulness and a moral purpose we must add a sense of the authority and sanctions of religion. Our moral nature is what God has made it to be ; so that when conscience is a legitimate development of this nature, it may be regarded as a Divine utterance,—the voice of God, speaking in and through our moral nature. Disobedience, therefore, becomes not merely an offence against conscience ; it is also an offence against God, bringing us under the judgment of God. The penalty begins, I allow, in the hurt done our own moral nature,—in shame and remorse ; but it does not end there : if it did, constitutional dulness in some, and blindness and hardness of heart in others, would make them careless and indifferent about it. I do not go to the extreme of holding that there would be no conscience without religion, no foundation for morality without some recognition of the will of God. Suppose all sense of the Divine being and agency to be blotted out of the human heart, I believe that conscience would still lift up its voice against baseness and crime; but in the presence of sore trial and temptation, in the stress and din of conflicting interests and passions and opinions, who would regard it? What gives effect to conscience is the mysterious and salutary dread, never entirely effaced even from the guilty soul, that there is an Almighty Vindicator and Avenger of conscience. This feeling, this principle, all should guard and nourish; not indeed as a substitute for conscience, but as re-enforcing conscience, and practically indispensable to its unfolding life and power.

One condition more. To make us more observant of conscience, and, at the same time, to make conscience what it ought to be, we must take our standard of righteousness from the New Testament. To moral thoughtfulness, a moral purpose, and the sanctions of religion, we must add a heart penetrated and filled with the spirit that was in our Lord Jesus Christ. Without sympathizing at all with those who are sometimes tempted to speak of Christianity as a failure, I still cannot help thinking that its good effects, at least on the moral and social condition of mankind, have not been so great as might naturally have been expected. This is doubtless to be ascribed, not to Christianity, but to Christians, who have always been more disposed to consider the Christian scheme of salvation in its relations to God, than in its relations to themselves,—his part in that scheme rather than ours. Most clearly we are not to be saved by the scheme, or by knowing and believing the scheme, except through its effect in fitting us for the kingdom of Heaven, in making us capable of the Christian salvation. We are to be saved by the truth only in so far as we live the truth. Let no one be turned aside from this conclusion by fear of the senseless clamor, that this is making salvation to depend on morality, a ground on which pagans might be saved as well as Christians. I am not speaking here of morality, simply considered; much less of pagan morality; but of the morality of the Gospel, the morality of the Sermon on the Mount. I am not speaking of mere righteousness, but of “the righteousness which is of faith;” not of obedience to conscience, whether well or ill instructed, but of obedience to conscience enlightened and sanctified by the Holy Spirit;—“till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.”

Look again at the example of Paul. What a noble declaration was that with which he was able to begin his defence before his countrymen: “Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God until this day." Still he was not content with this, and therefore he says, in another place: "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect; but I follow after, if that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus. Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended; but this one thing I do: forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth to those things which are before, I press toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Here lay the secret of his greatness. He did not rely on a morbidly sensitive conscience, the vain refuge of fanatics; nor yet on the hard rigor of an obstinate conscience, the still vainer refuge of bigots; but on a conscience as quick to learn as to feel,—a conscience speaking with the authority of God, and therefore listening reverently to every new revelation from God, insisting on the law of progress, and therefore the more ready to be itself included under that law, accepting life as a struggle, and turning that struggle into a victory. Hence the triumphant words with which he could look forward to his death are nobler even than those with which, in the text, he had looked back on his past life. "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight;

I have finished my course; I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all those also that love his appearing."

MOTIVES.

WHILE I WAS MUSING THE FIRE BURNED. — Psalm xxxix. 3.

WHEN we witness the performance of a noble deed, when we become acquainted with a noble character, when we read the life of a great and good man, we are tempted to ascribe his superiority, in great measure at least, to a difference of circumstances. "He has had facilities, incentives, motives," we are apt to say, "such as have not fallen to the lot of most men. Give us the same facilities, give us the same incentives and motives to virtue, and we should be glad to do as he has done. The difference in his moral attainments is mainly owing to the different influences under which he has acted. He has felt motives which we have not."

Undoubtedly there is a sense in which this is true. He has felt motives which we have not. But why has he felt them?

To answer this question, we must begin by answering several others on which it depends. What are motives? What gives efficacy to one motive over another in particular cases? And why is it, that while this man is alive to the highest motives of human conduct, that man is alive only to the lowest? We must press each of these questions home, and then, perhaps, it will appear, that what is often set forward as an excuse, is only another ground for humiliation and self-reproach.

In the first place, then, what are motives, externally considered? All will agree, I suppose, that they do not act on the mind as impulse acts on bodies; that is, by virtue of a power or momentum which they possess in themselves, and independently of the persons moved. Neither is it a mere transference of motion from one body to another; as when one ball strikes another ball, and causes it to move. Motives act on the mind, it is true, but not until the mind has first acted on them. They act on the mind accordingly as they affect the mind; but then they affect the mind according to the view which the mind is led by its prevailing habits and dispositions to take of them. Set before a promiscuous collection of men a great variety of motives,—such as ease, pleasure, wealth, influence, fame, conscious integrity,—and you will soon perceive that the law of elective affinities holds as good in the moral as in the natural world. Each individual will be affected mainly, if not exclusively, by that class of motives which falls in with his prevailing habits and dispositions. One will give up everything to enjoy ease ; another will risk everything to indulge in pleasure ; a third will do anything and everything to obtain wealth, influence, or fame ; a fourth is only anxious that he may do what is right. Thus one man is influenced and determined by one motive, and another by another ; and yet none can complain, that all the motives were not set before him.

Motives, then, are considerations set before a rational being, not to move him, in the strict sense of that word, but to induce him to move himself. After all, the principle of motion is not in the motive, but in the man himself. Strictly speaking, in our voluntary acts we are never moved ; we always move ourselves. The motive, externally considered, is the reason or consideration for acting, or not acting, in a particular way ; which, of course, will be attended to and appreciated very differently by different persons, and so affect them very differently.

Let us next consider, what gives efficacy to one motive over another in particular cases? An opinion prevails on this subject, which, though true to a certain extent, may be pushed too far. It is said that motives affect us through the concurrence of good or bad dispositions previously existing in our own minds. Of course, nobody will deny that where the motive falls in with a strong propensity already existing in the mind, it is much more likely to prevail on that account. But we should remember, there was a time when this propensity had not begun to manifest itself, and that it never would have manifested itself at all except on condition of some motive which had power to awaken it,—to call it forth. Now what gives to motives this power to call forth a latent propensity, or disposition of the soul, in the first instance? We might say, in general, that it is owing to a certain correspondence or mutual adaptation between the motive and the disposition,—one to excite, and the other to be excited. But this does not explain the difficulty, why it is that the same motive does not have the same effect on all men, and on the same man at all times. Therefore, to answer the question more explicitly, we should say, that it is the actual feeling or perception of this correspondence or mutual adaptation between the motive and the disposition to be awakened thereby. It is not enough that the quality exists; the individual must feel, must perceive that it exists, or else to him it does not exist. Those who perceive it, and attend to it, and give themselves up to it, are affected; those who do not are not affected.

And now we are prepared to take up the third question, Why is it, 'that while one man is alive to the higher motives of human conduct, another is alive only to the lower motives? Something doubtless is attributable to difference of organization and temperament, but not the whole. If it were, how should we be able to account for material and essential changes in moral and religious sensibility, which the same individual often undergoes? In the case of repentance, involving a real change of heart, it will hardly be pretended that this alters a man's organization or temperament; and yet how entirely it alters his sensibility to moral and religious motives. These motives were always before him; but he did not see them, or at least he did not feel them, as he does now. In this respect he differs from his former self, just as all good men differ from all bad men; nevertheless, organically considered, he is the same man he always has been. So likewise of acquired habits, considered as predisposing men to be affected by certain motives. If we say, that a man is alive to the highest motives merely from his acquired habits and predispositions, then the question arises, how it is that, under the influence of motives, these habits and predispositions were acquired in the first instance; and again, how it is, that, under the influence of new and counter-acting motives, they are sometimes radically changed. In the case of a rational, moral, and free being there must be something which modifies and rules mere organization and habit; and this something would seem to be the power of certain external incitements or motives to evoke slumbering elements of the soul, to bring out latent principles of action in the first instance, and thus to give, as it were, a new pitch to the whole character. And, other things being equal, this power is felt by the individual just in proportion as the incitement or motive is attended to,—attention being the means through which it is brought into connection with the mind, and acts on the soul.

There is no exception to this law. Even what has just been conceded to organization and predisposition, natural or acquired, resolves itself at last into this law. Why is it that motives have more influence over the mind in proportion as it is in any way predisposed to be affected by them? The chief, if not the sole reason, is, that such a mind gives them more attention and thought, enters into them more fully and entirely as realities, returns to them more frequently, and dwells upon them to the exclusion of other things. It is not that such a person is moved without attending, but only that he is more sure to attend; for his heart is in it, which is the great condition of earnest and undivided attention.

Hence it follows, that serious and earnest attention to the highest motives of human conduct awakens and calls out the highest and best affections of the soul ; and again, it is only by renewing this attention from day to day, that these affections are kept alive and rendered more and more intense. In the words of the text : “ While I was musing the fire burned.” For this reason the Scriptures everywhere lay great stress on meditation and holy contemplation, on communing with God and our own souls, and having our conversation in heaven, as the conditions of “ newness of life.” “ Beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord, we are changed into the same image from glory to glory, as by the spirit of the Lord.”

If, then, we do not feel the highest motives of human conduct, it is not because they are not set before us, nor yet because we are incapable of feeling them, but because we do not attend to them.

To this, however, an objection will be likely to occur to most minds, which I hasten to notice. It will be said, that there are those who have made the highest motives of human conduct, that is, moral and religious considerations, not only objects of attention, but the study of their whole lives, and thus have become eminent philosophers and theologians, who nevertheless do not feel these motives any more, if indeed they do as much, as many an ignorant and simple-hearted Christian who never entered into an inquiry on the subject, and never had a doubt.

The fact is admitted ; but in order to reconcile it with what has been advanced, it is only necessary to point out an obvious distinction between speculation and meditation ; between that reflection which is the act of a questioning spirit, and that reflection which is the act of a believing spirit. It is the principal business of the philosopher and theologian to prove the truth and reality of the moral and religious motives ; but this is to attend to the evidence of the motives, and not to the motives themselves. How can a man be said to attend to a motive, as a motive, until he is prepared to take for granted its truth and reality ? for if it is not true and real, it is not a motive ; it does not exist to be the object of his attention as a motive. He is only inquiring whether there is such a motive or not. Nay, more ; if he has spent much time in discussing the truth and reality of the higher motives, even though he should at last decide the question in the affirmative, as often as he returns to the subject the old habit will be apt to be revived, and he will find himself considering, not what these motives are, but whether they exist. This is the penalty, or at least the danger, of an inquisitive and speculative turn of mind, and accounts for the alleged moral and religious coldness and insensibility of some philosophers and theologians, without making it to be an exception to the law laid down above. If the simple-hearted Christian is more alive to moral and religious motives, it is because these motives are more frequently and intimately present to his soul, as realities; — not perhaps as questions, but as realities. The law, therefore, holds good, as before. A peculiar connection or correspondence subsists between certain motives and considerations, and the dispositions and affections which they are adapted to awaken and evoke. It is only necessary for us to give our minds and hearts to these motives and considerations, until we enter into their nature, and then that nature, the grace of God consenting, will do the rest. “While I was musing the fire burned.”

Taking this principle along with us, we shall not find much difficulty in explaining some of the greatest perplexities of the Christian life.

In the first place, it will help us to define, with sufficient distinctness at least for all practical purposes, the office of free will. Whatever may be true in theory, there can be no doubt that, in practice, we are generally disappointed, when we expect a great deal from man’s self-determining power. The reason is, not that this power does not exist, but that it is not applied at the right time, and in the right place. No doubt I may say, it depends on myself whether I see a particular object, or not, because it depends on myself whether I open my eyes, and look in that direction, or not. But supposing me to keep my eyes shut, or to look in another direction, then certainly it does not depend on myself whether I see that object, or not. Just so in respect to the influence of the higher, that is to say, the Christian motives. I may say, and say with truth, that it depends on myself, under God, whether I feel, and am affected by, these motives, because it depends on myself whether I attend to them, and put myself in the way of them, and seek to enter into their spirit, and bring them, as it were, into contact with my nature. But if from any cause I refuse or neglect to do this, then, of course, I shall not feel these motives, nor be affected by them, let me desire it or will it ever so much. In the action of any motive three conditions are implied: first, the nature of the motive; secondly, our own nature considered as adapted to be affected thereby; and, thirdly, attention on our part, by which the motive and our nature are brought together. Now the first two of these conditions are given quantities in all cases: the third is the only one which remains to be determined; and that we may either determine for ourselves, or, like many, drifting with the current of events, we may allow it to be determined for us.

Again; the same principle will help to explain why it is, that when men become decidedly religious it is often in consequence of some startling or impressive event,—the death of a friend, a remarkable escape, a pungent discourse, a striking remark, a dream, a thought. It may be said that such an occurrence does not add one iota to the number or the strength of the motives to a Christian life which these persons had, and which they knew they had, before. And this is true; but it calls attention to those motives; and this, as we have seen, is all that was wanted. As a general rule, men are not insensible to religious motives because they are ignorant of them, or because they do not believe in them, or because they think them of secondary importance; but simply and solely because they do not attend to them. Their minds are taken up with other things. And if you ask again, how it happens that their minds are taken up by other things, though confessedly of less importance, the answer is ready. Though these other things are confessedly of less importance on the whole, and in the long run, they are nevertheless much more obvious, and more immediately pressing. Common and worldly motives are spread, if I may so express it, on the outside of things: they are obtruded on our notice; we cannot shut our eyes upon them if we would; we can hardly help attending to them, and attending to them continually. On the contrary, spiritual considerations, those which address themselves peculiarly to Christians, lie deeper: they are not forced on our regards by the necessities of our physical condition; we can attend to them, or not, as we please. Nay, to attend to them as we ought, to enter into their full significancy, to make them intimately present to our souls,—in one word, to make what is unseen to be real to the eye of the mind, so that it shall affect us as if it were seen by the eye of the body,—this supposes a degree of abstraction from earthly things, and an ascendancy of reason or conscience over sense, which, in the present state of human culture and public morals, are hardly to be expected in the bulk of mankind, unless their attention is aroused by some startling event.

Once more; the view here taken of the manner in which men become alive to the highest motives will also account satisfactorily for local and temporary excitements in morals and religion. These are sometimes referred to sympathy and imitation, and even to causes less pure. Much of what is superficial and transient in them, and many of the attendant circumstances, are doubtless to be explained in this way; but not the whole. What is real and lasting in these movements has its origin in the general attention to the subject which, somehow or other, has been awakened. No new motives are discovered or invented. It is not pretended that any new motives are discovered or invented. The selfsame motives and considerations are urged which have been urged for a thousand years: the difference in the effect is owing to the greater attention which is paid to them; and this attention is more likely to be fixed, earnest, and continual, from the fact that the whole community is attending to the same subjects at the same time.

Take as a familiar illustration of this law the Temperance Reform. It is not pretended that men have found out any new motives for being temperate, or any new means of resisting temptations to intemperance. All the topics, all, at least, which are of much real weight, are old and trite, perhaps beyond those of any other subject which can be named. The movement, the marvel, the miracle, as some are disposed to account it, is to be ascribed to the increased attention which is given to these topics; and what may be termed the machinery of the movement is valuable only in proportion as it has a tendency to arrest and hold this attention.

The same is also true of what are called Revivals of Religion, affecting whole churches and whole communities. So far as they may be resolved into sympathy, imitation, or nervous excitability, they are nothing in a moral and religious point of view.

But it is hardly to be presumed that men can meet together to talk about religion, and go home to think about it, day after day, that religion should thus become the one object of interest in public and private for a long time, and yet that no minds should be affected by it deeply and permanently. Still, in this case, it is not because any new considerations are set before them: the considerations, the motives, are not new; the interest, the attention, — that only is new.

This, then, would seem to be the true theory of motives. God, in his works and Word, has set before us all reasons, inducements, considerations fitted to call forth the best parts of our nature, and so to lay the foundation of the noblest traits of character. But in order that these reasons, inducements, considerations may have any effect, they must be brought into contact, so to speak, with our nature; and this can only be done by our attending to them, — voluntarily, solemnly, earnestly; and attending to them, not in a questioning, but in a believing spirit. It is not enough that the motives really exist: before they can be said to exist for us, we must believe them to exist. Nay, it is not enough that we believe them to exist, for we are not affected by the simple fact that they exist, but by what they are in their own nature; which is such that we cannot attend to it and dwell upon it without feeling our own nature to be touched and transformed. "While I was musing the fire burned."

Let me then, in concluding, ask you to revert once more to the plea so often set up by the un-devout, the indifferent, the worldly-minded: — to wit, that they do not feel the motives to virtue and piety which good men do. The fact is admitted; but when we come to analyze it, we find that, in most cases at least, it turns out to be, not an excuse, but a part of the wrong. As we have seen, they do not distinguish, they do not believe, they do not feel, because they do not attend. But attention is pre-eminently a voluntary act, and one, therefore, in respect to which all are pre-eminently free and responsible. Undoubtedly some men have more outward changes than others, — more admonitory and startling providences to arouse attention and direct it to higher and more enduring objects. But these things are not indispensable; neither is it in this way that the virtue of the eminently good is usually built up. It is enough for the latter if reason and conscience pronounce the course to be fit and right; they do not require to be dragooned into duty. Besides, who is willing to say, or to believe, that he is always determined from without, and never from within. That there are such men I do not deny, men who practically disown and abdicate the power to choose for themselves even what they will attend to, that is to say, in what direction they will look. But who, I ask again, would consent to take his place in such company,—the seaweed and driftwood of society, collecting here or there just as the wind, the tide, or the eddy happens to set? We must take care, and not seek self-justification in what must bring with it self-scorn.

The way, then, is open. You complain that you do not feel the higher motives of human conduct as good men do. Depend upon it, it is because you do not attend to them as good men do; and this again is because you do not try to attend to them as good men do,—I do not mean, as matters of speculation, but as matters of reality and holy trust. The unutterable love of God, the gentleness, the sinlessness, the self-sacrifice of Jesus, the peace and dignity of virtue, the anticipated bliss of heaven,—it is not in human nature that we should be practically familiar with such thoughts without being touched and transformed. I do not say, in a moment; for the change is not a mechanical wrench, but a living process: the words of the text express the law, “While I was musing the fire burned,”—the true, sacred fire of the earth, which kindles the aspirations of struggling virtue, which glows in the heart of the patriot, the philanthropist, and the Christian, and which the many waters of death cannot quench.

CHARACTER.

WHEREWITH SHALL A YOUNG MAN CLEANSE HIS WAY? BY TAKING HEED THERETO ACCORDING TO THY WORD.— Psalm cxix. 9.

IN modern discourses on practical religion much is said about habits and character. It is remarkable that neither of these words is to be met with in the Bible. But though the words are not there, the sense is. The Bible has as little as possible to do with abstractions and generalities. What we call a man's habits, the Bible calls his ways; and what we call a man's character, the Bible calls his life.

The text, interpreted by the light of this principle, introduces the question, How is a young man, or any man, to form his habits? and also the still more important one, How is he to mould these habits into character, so as really to have a character and a Christian character.

What is character, as that word is here understood?

Not surely reputation; for a man may have a reputation, that is, be distinguished and notorious, for the want of character. And besides, reputation is not what a man is or has in himself, but what he is said to be or to have. By character, as the term is used in this discourse, we mean a man's actual state;—not the opinion, true or false, entertained respecting him.

In what, then, I ask again, does it consist? Not surely in passion, propensity, predisposition. A man who acts from the feeling which happens to be uppermost at the time may have good or bad impulses; but he cannot be said to have a character. Sometimes, in common parlance, a man of strong natural aptitudes and proclivities is called a man of strong character; but it is a mistake, or, more properly, a misnomer: the utmost that can be said of such a person is, that he has the materials of a strong character. It is indispensable to character that a man should act from habit, and not from passion. The passion may give rise to the habit, and act through it; still character supposes something more stable than passion; there must be habit to determine us, even when the passion is not felt.

Hence some have made character to be the sum total of a man's habits. Will this definition satisfy all the conditions of the case? I think not. A jumble of habits will no more make a character than a jumble of passions. Habits often grow up blindly and indeterminately, without a single care or thought on the part of the individual acquiring them. Such habits have no more to do with the formation of character, properly so called, than the blind and indeterminate action of the passions themselves. Take, for example, indolent or intemperate habits, which men do not so much form as fall into. The truth is, such habits are but passions under another form, — just as blind and indeterminate, only more constant. And this is not all. A man may be addicted to inconsistent and contradictory habits, just as he may be the slave of inconsistent and contradictory passions. Of course in such cases one set of habits will exclude the other for the time being, but not from taking its turn as the scene shifts. Have you never met with a man who seemed to act from one set of habits when things went well with him, and from another set of habits when things went amiss, — from one set of habits when in society, and from a totally different set when alone? If then the sum total of a man's habits, any how constituted, is all that is wanting to character, you would make such a man to have two, or three, or four characters; which is the very reverse of what we mean by having a character, — that is, something by which he is always known.

Character, therefore, in the highest and truest sense of that word, supposes not one thing only, but two things. In the first place, it is made up of habits; and, in the second place, these habits must be shaped and moulded into a consistent and harmonious whole. The character is more or less complete and perfect according to the degree of its consistency, and the entireness with which the whole is filled up and rounded out.

Adopting this definition, it would plainly be most unreasonable to expect a person to begin life with a character already formed. He cannot do it. We are not born with a character, good or bad, but only with a capacity to form one. However widely children differ from each other in their aptitudes and predispositions, that is to say, in the elements of a future character, they agree nevertheless in this, that the character itself is yet to be formed. All, therefore, that we have a right to require or expect of a young person growing up into maturity is this;—that he should look on the formation of an upright, honorable, Christian character as the great business, the great success of life.

How is such a character to be formed?

This question is not only proposed but answered in the text: “Wherewith shall a young man cleanse his way? By taking heed thereto according to thy Word.” That is to say, an upright, honorable, and Christian character is to be formed by watching over our habits, and bringing them into conformity with the highest, that is, the Christian standard of truth and duty.

In the first place, we must watch over the habits we are forming from day to day.

To inculcations of this nature it has sometimes been objected, that the health of the soul, as well as that of the body, may be hurt by too much looking after. And there is doubtless a sense in which this is true. We do not want moral dyspeptics who are always thinking about cases of conscience, any more than physical dyspeptics who are always thinking about symptoms of indigestion. To weigh out everything one eats or drinks at every meal by grains and scruples would make him an invalid, if it did not find him one. And so in morals. But all this applies to a minute and painful scrupulosity as regards particular actions; it has nothing to do with a general watchfulness over the formation of habits. Nay, one of the principal reasons why we should be careful to form good habits is, that having made sure of them, there will be the less occasion to be anxious about single actions. The habit of doing right will lead us to do right spontaneously. It is as in learning to speak a language. In the beginning we have to think of every word we are going to utter, and even with this precaution speak but poorly and hesitatingly. After we have thoroughly mastered the language, that is, have grown into the habit of speaking it, the words may almost be said to come of themselves.

From this it also appears that in watching over the habits we are forming from day to day, our whole duty is not done by seeing to it, that no bad ones are contracted. You will sometimes hear it said of a man, that he has no bad habits, as if this were all that could reasonably be required of him. But not so. The absence of bad habits is but the negative side of a good character, what it is not; the positive side, in other words, that which makes it to be what it is, is found in the good habits which go to make up its substance and form. It is a great thing, I allow, not to have any bad habits,—more, I am afraid, than is true either of you or of me, our only hope being that we have some good habits to weigh against the bad. A man is not good, merely because he is not bad. A great deal too much is made to depend on the mere absence, real or supposed, of bad habits. Even if we had no bad habits, we should still be liable to bad and dangerous impulses; and what is to hinder these from breaking out, from time to time, into acts of license and crime, unless they are restrained by one good habit at least, that of self-control? And besides, what reliance can be placed on the best of impulses, considered merely as single, unregulated impulses? Take generosity, for example. Who has yet to learn that it is almost as likely to do harm as good, until it has been trained to obey the rules imposed upon it by reason and experience? that is to say, until it has ceased to act as a blind impulse, and become a habit? For the same reason, all dependence on the sentiments of honor, or the sentiments of virtue, or the sentiments of religion is worth but little, if these sentiments are understood to end with being mere sentiments; if they do not grow into habits; if from being a mere force or impulse they do not become a direction and a self-imposed law; in short, if from being a part of our undisciplined nature, they do not become a part of our disciplined character.

We are further to consider, in watching over the formation of our habits, that actions, the most trivial in themselves, if often repeated, become of great and decisive importance. You have been told again and again that the morality of a man's actions depends on his motives; and so it does, if you are considering the morality of particular actions. But if you are considering the effect of the whole on his character, on the man himself, on his moral progress, you must take into account consequences as well as motives,—not merely how the action finds him, but how it leaves him. How, in other words, are his habits of thought and feeling and conduct affected thereby? And under this point of view it is not the great, but the trivial and often repeated delinquency, from which we have the most to dread. Great crimes not unfrequently have the effect to startle and arrest the sinner in his downward course, and bring him to a pause; at any rate, they never induce the habit from which they flow. A man does not contract a habit of murder; he contracts a habit of malice and cruelty, almost always little by little, and murder is incident to this habit. It is almost always some venial form of the offence, renewed day after day, looked upon as indifferent or at least as allowable, and therefore exciting no compunction or alarm, provoking no indignation, stealing over us under cover of outward decorum and worldly respectability, which is most likely to fix and rivet the accursed habit.

This, then, is the first step towards the formation of a truly Christian character,—namely, to watch over the influence which our daily conduct is having on our habits. Of course, we must look to our actions too, for they express what we are, but still more to our habits, for they make us what we are. Habits, of some sort or other, every one will have,—habits of thinking, habits of feeling, habits of acting; the only question being, of what sort. A grown-up savage is sometimes said to be still in a state of nature ; but it is not so : he is just as much under the dominion of acquired habits as you are. His dark superstitions, his stoical indifference to pain, the point of honor of his tribe, his very mien and gait, are not nature ; they are all acquired habits,—as much so as the fashions and conventionalities of the most refined courts in Europe. And so of much that is said against education, considered as forestalling the mature judgment of the individual. Certain zealots for what they call the free développement of mind object to early moral and religious training, because, forsooth, they would have the child grow up into life without any prejudices or leanings one way or another. But have these persons yet to learn, that, whether you strive to prepossess the child in favor of religion or not, a thousand causes are at work to prepossess him against it, or what in practice amounts to nearly the same thing, against the conditions on which it depends. The question is not whether something or nothing shall grow in your fields ; but whether it shall be corn or weeds. And not only so. “ One being asked, what could be the reason why weeds grew more plentifully than corn, answered, Because the earth was the mother of weeds, but the step-mother of corn ; that is, the one she produced of her own accord, the other not till she was compelled to it by man’s toil and industry.” *

* Jortin’s Sermons on Different Subjects, Vol. III. p. 6.

Once more, therefore, let me inculcate the duty incumbent on every one that lives, to watch over every change in his habits, however slight, with an untiring vigilance. Do not suspect me of pressing the doctrine of works to the extent of excluding or undervaluing the doctrine of grace. I do not forget that faith is the spring of Christian holiness, and that the Spirit must "help our infirmities" in order to make this faith effective. But these necessary and merciful provisions, to be of any avail to us personally, must be accepted by us personally; they must become ours in the sense of entering into our proper life, that is, into the inward and outward habits in which our proper life consists. What our habits are, we are. If they are Christian, we are Christian; if they are pagan, we are pagan;—no matter what may be our professions, no matter what may be our connections, no matter what may be our single and unconnected actions. "Many will say unto me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name have done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you. Depart from me, ye that work iniquity." It is, I repeat it, a question of habits; of habits, too, which are changing every hour; and what makes the danger a thousand-fold greater is, that these changes are often brought about by influences, concessions, delinquencies, of so little moment, singly considered, as to attract no notice at the time, yet by constant repetition giving a radical and fatal bias to the whole character.

Depend upon it, we do not muster our defences at the most exposed points, if it is against the commission of great single crimes. I cannot, I will not believe, that any here are on the brink of outraging the laws or public opinion by deeds of flagrant injustice or infamy. But there is not one among us all so wise, so circumspect, so generally well-disposed, as not to be in danger of an insensible decay of his good habits, or an insensible strengthening of his bad habits, through the frequent repetition of what are looked upon as allowable indulgences. What I most fear for you, is what I most fear for myself. It is, that the treating of sacred things with lightness, or even with unconcern, or seeing them frequently so treated by others, will grow up into habits of irreverence. It is that a propensity to color and overstate in conversation, merely to please, or for effect, will gradually weaken and confuse our abiding sense of the sacredness of truth. It is that obstinacy in trifles, or giving way to slight impulses of impatience or anger, or the indulgence of ill-humor, or the use of sharp expressions, will insensibly generate a temper at once passionate and self-willed.

Here, I insist, — precisely here, and not in great single temptations or in great single crimes, — our principal danger lies. It will not do to say of the small sins in question, that they are nothing. Taken singly, they may not be much; but taken together, and in their connection and repetition, they go to make up our habits, and our habits are everything. Neither will it do to say of our minor faults, that they are trifles because the first appearance of an earnest purpose will scatter them to the winds. Whoever takes this ground forgets two things. In the first place, he forgets that these minor faults, if repeated and persisted in, will eat out the very heart and life of that on which all earnestness of purpose depends. And, in the second place, he forgets that the earnest purpose, even though it should come, may come too late. While we are sleeping in a false security, the faults in question, pigmies though they are, will have time to pin us down by innumerable threads, so that when we awake, we shall find ourselves as effectually bound as if by strong cords, as if by fetters of iron.

I have left myself room but for one more suggestion. As was intimated before, a jumble of habits, even of good habits, will not make a character. These habits must be so shaped and moulded as to form a consistent and harmonious whole; and to be a Christian character, this whole must express the Christian ideal of goodness. It is not enough that a young man takes heed to his ways ; it must be with a view to realize, as far as human infirmity will permit, the Christian conception of a perfect man. Every one knows that the pagan type of character is a very different thing from the Jewish type of character ; and again, that the Jewish type of character is a very different thing from the Christian type of character. In each case the character required is made up, for the most part, of good habits ; but the habits are combined in different proportions, so that the whole expresses a different idea, exhibits a different style, of goodness.

Hence, as it seems to me, one of the first things to be attended to in Christian nurture is, to keep before the minds of the young, and before the minds of all, the Christian conception of a perfect man. How much better it would be if the primers of the Church, instead of attempting to define what are called "the mysteries of faith," would aim to show what are the qualities of heart and life by which a Christian is known. Here, also, as I cannot help thinking, is the true and only practicable ground of union among Christians. You cannot make men agree in the abstract principles into which the Christian character should be resolved ; it is enough if they agree in the character itself, and manifest that character in their daily conduct.

By taking this course, we do but follow in the steps of our Lord. Read his discourses; read his Sermon on the Mount: it is impossible not to see that his main object is to teach men, not how to speculate, but how to live; to impress it upon us, that unless our righteousness "exceeds the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees," we "cannot enter into the Kingdom of Heaven," and to point out as precisely as may be wherein the difference should consist. Need I add, in conclusion, that by taking this view of the subject we impart a new value and a new significance to the example of our Lord. Not content with giving the Christian character in description, in idea, he has given it in fact, that "we all, with open face beholding as in a glass the glory of the Lord," may be "changed into the same image from glory to glory;" till we all come, in the only practicable unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, "unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."

GOVERNMENT OF THE THOUGHTS.

BRINGING INTO CAPTIVITY EVERY THOUGHT TO THE OBEDIENCE
OF CHRIST. — 2 Corinthians x. 5.

I SUPPOSE there are few prerogatives which men would be less inclined to part with than the absolute secrecy and independence of their thoughts. The tyrant may fetter my limbs, and seal my lips; but there is one thing which he cannot do by the utmost stretch of his power. He cannot hinder me from thinking as I please; neither can he know what I think, unless I please to tell him.

But this very fact, as it shows that neither the law nor public opinion can take cognizance of our thoughts, only makes it the more indispensable that we should take the proper regulation and government of them into our own hands. What others cannot do for us, or even help us to do, each one should feel the more bound to do for himself, — taking care to keep himself inwardly as well as outwardly pure, “bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ.”

Here, however, an objection is sometimes raised, which, if allowed to stand, must make the inculcation in the text of no effect. Our thoughts, it is said, succeed each other according to fixed and unalterable laws, one thought bringing up another in a constant train or current, over which the will has no more power than over the current of blood in our veins.

What there is of plausibility in this error arises, as is usual in like cases, from a mixture of truth. Unquestionably it is not for our will of itself, directly and immediately, to determine what we shall think of at the moment; neither can we, merely by willing it, stop thinking altogether. Thus much is true; but it does not follow that we have no control whatever over our trains of thought. All those who concede anything to human freedom must allow, that we are free to make any particular thought which comes up in one of these trains an object of special attention. We can arrest it and hold it before the mind for this purpose; which will have the effect, not indeed to stop our thinking, but to give a new direction to our thoughts. Obviously, therefore, the turn which our thinking takes depends, for the most part, on ourselves. Suppose, for example, that I am thinking of a sinful indulgence; I am free to think of that side of it which invites, or of that side of it which repels;

I can think of it as an indulgence merely, or as a sinful indulgence ; and the train of thought to which the whole will give rise will vary accordingly. When I say I can do either one or the other, as I choose, it is no objection to reply that I cannot do it without some reason or motive. Certainly not. But the question is, whether, having a reason or motive to give my thoughts a particular direction, that is to say, believing it to be expedient and right, it is not within my power to do so.

There is also another way in which a man's will exerts an indirect, but yet an important and decisive, control over the tenor of his thoughts: As has been said, we are competent at any moment freely and deliberately to select out of a train of thoughts that one to which we will attend. But we will suppose this selection made, not freely and deliberately, but spontaneously, or from the impulse of the moment, as is probably the fact in most cases ; still what we do spontaneously, or from the impulse of the moment, depends on the state of our minds, and this again depends, for the most part, on what we have chosen to make it, or allow it to become. What we call acting impulsively or spontaneously originates, in nine cases out of ten, not in our nature properly so called, but in some habit which has been superinduced ;—not in our nature as it came from the hand of God, but as it has been developed and shaped by a long series of our own voluntary acts. Hence it is, for the most part, that different persons are affected so very differently by the same objects,—what will suggest vicious and impure thoughts to one having no such effect, perhaps the opposite effect, on another. The same book, for example, which will do incalculable injury to a man of bad principles, or of no principle, may be read with much less danger, perhaps with perfect safety, by one whose innocence is guarded, at every point, by discretion, a pure taste, and the fear of God.

Say not, then, that it is of the nature of certain objects to force on us bad thoughts. Say, rather, that the thoughts which any object will suggest to us, are those only which we, from the existing state of our minds, are led to associate with it; and that out of these we can select which we will make the object of special attention; and further, even if, in making this selection, we are more determined by habit than deliberate choice, we should remember that this habit is our own work. Our abiding and predominant trains of thought depend, therefore, on some act of the will, either present or past, or, at any rate, on a series of voluntary acts which have resulted in our existing habits or biases of character.

Accordingly it will not do to disown all responsibility respecting the government of our thoughts, on the plea that they are not subject to our control. Let our circumstances be what they may, if we take into view our conduct from the beginning, it depends on ourselves what shall be the general complexion and tendency of our thoughts, almost as much as it does what shall be the general complexion and tendency of our words and actions. Who does not know that a good man's upright purpose extends to his motives and his dispositions; that it penetrates and subdues his inward as well as his outward life?

Thus far, the aim of my reasoning has been to prove that no object is likely to suggest bad thoughts, except through the concurrence of a weakened or depraved mind.

But, in a practical view of the subject, this is taking higher ground than is necessary, or perhaps judicious. Let us admit then, that, in the present condition of humanity, there are some things so adapted of themselves to excite bad thoughts that they will have this effect on the best minds. Still this does not hinder us from being able to govern our thoughts, for it by no means follows that we are obliged to put ourselves in the way of such things. The government of our thoughts is as much in our own hands as ever; only it is on the condition that we do not expose ourselves to those particular temptations. Take, for example, the influence of bad books. A book may be so very bad, so thoroughly and insidicously bad, that it cannot be read without unsettling or defiling, more or less, the best minds. But the best minds are not obliged to read that book, or to look into it, or to touch it; nay, will not be disposed to do so, for the very reason that they are the best minds. And so of company, and conversation, and scenes. Undoubtedly there are situations into which a good man may thrust himself, if he will, where his tone of thinking is almost sure to be lowered, and in the end utterly corrupted, whether he will or no. In a certain companionship the bad thoughts are forced upon him; but the companionship itself is not forced upon him; so that he is still free, even as regards his thoughts. He is not free to avoid the thoughts, if he does not avoid the companionship, but he is free to avoid both.

Here, however, a distinction should be made between mere neighborhood, mere proximity, and real companionship. Men are often constrained to live together in the same vicinity, and it may be in the same house, or the same room; but companionship implies something more. It implies confidence and concert, a certain community of feeling, of tastes, of pleasures; and these cannot be forced. You know how it is in schools and colleges, in a ship or in camp: there all live together, and must live together, but each selects for his companions whom he will; and if he chooses to select those whose intercourse tends by necessity to corrupt and debase his mind, it is his own fault ; he has incurred an evil which he might have avoided if he would ; and therefore he has nobody to blame but himself.

Let me add, that the control which every man has, or might have, over his thoughts does not consist in prevention alone. We will now suppose that objects suggesting bad thoughts suggest them alike to all minds, and again, that we are necessarily exposed to these objects ; in other words, we will suppose, (though, as a general rule, nothing can be further from the truth,) that bad thoughts force their way into our minds unbidden, no power or prudence on our part being able to keep them out ; — still, even on this supposition, it must certainly depend on ourselves what reception we give to the intruders, and also how long we allow them to stay. Bad single thoughts may flit, from time to time, through the minds of good men ; but it is bad men only who encourage, or even tolerate, their stay ; — who welcome them ; who recall them ; who suffer their imaginations to dwell upon them until the moral taint they convey has had time to sink into the very substance of the soul. I do not mean that we can expel bad thoughts by no thoughts, leaving our minds entirely empty. If we would expel bad thoughts, it must be by the preference we give to good thoughts, that is, by introducing good thoughts into their place. However beset and haunted by bad thoughts, if a man is sincere and in earnest in his wish to rid himself of them, a single fervent ejaculation, a single turning of his whole soul to God, will be sufficient to rebuke or scare them away. The old Catholic superstition, that to pronounce the name of Jesus and make the sign of the cross would put to flight evil spirits, was doubtless fostered by the fact, if it did not grow out of it, that they were found to put to flight evil suggestions, by diverting our thoughts into another channel, and lifting them into a higher and holier region.

Away, then, with that subtle but most inconsistent form of fatalism, which teaches that we can help our actions, but not our thoughts. What is to choose but to think; and without freedom of choice what freedom of action could there be? All freedom, therefore, begins and ends with freedom of thought. As we have seen, it depends on ourselves, in no small measure, whether our minds are in a state to be accessible to bad thoughts; and again, it depends on ourselves, for the most part, whether we are thrown in the way of bad thoughts; and finally, even when, from any cause, bad thoughts find their way into the mind, it depends on ourselves whether we allow them to stay, or drive them out. Within certain limits, therefore, and as far as morality goes, we have as real a control over our thoughts as over our actions or our limbs.

This being conceded, nothing remains but to consider some of the reasons and motives which should induce us to exert this power wisely and effectually, "bringing into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ."

Consider, in the first place, how much the thoughts have to do in forming and determining the whole character.

"Thought," says an eloquent writer, "is the rudder of human action. As the thought is wise or foolish, good or bad, vicious or moral, the cause of action is noxious or salutary. When, therefore, I am told it is but a thought, I am told that it is the most important of all things." Tell me what are a man's thoughts, and you do not tell me what he will actually do, but you tell me what he would like to do. Tell me what are a man's thoughts, and you do not tell me what he is in the judgment of the world, for the world judges by the outward appearance, but you tell me what he is in the judgment of God, who looketh on the heart. Thoughts have been called "the seeds of conduct;" but they are more than this. They are seeds which have already begun to germinate under ground; they have begun to develop their natural and essential properties, whether for good or for evil, though they have not come as yet to the light of day. In this way the whole character may be covertly undermined; the rot which began at the core may thus spread through the whole substance before it appears on the surface; so that a man may not begin to be suspected, nay, may hardly begin to suspect himself, until he is well-nigh lost. Melancholy and startling instances of this description occur, from time to time, in what is regarded as the sudden fall of men who have hitherto enjoyed the entire confidence of the community. There is no such thing as a sudden fall from virtue,—from a high and strict virtue. These men have been falling for years in the slow decay of all upright purpose and thought.

It will help us to understand how this can be, and at the same time strengthen our general conviction as to the necessity of controlling our thoughts, if we consider, in the second place, that every sin begins in a sin of thought; that is to say, in some vicious purpose or intention, and often in meditating, over and over again, what at length we are emboldened to do. The last suggestion is one which I wish to impress upon you. As a general rule, it is only after frequently revolving crime in their minds that men find the resolution, or rather the hardihood, to commit it. When sinful thoughts are spoken of, I believe it is common to suppose that a particular class of sins are referred to,—those, I mean, which offend against purity. But I make no such limitation here. I believe it to be true, in general, of all crimes, that they are rehearsed, so to express it, again and again, in thought, before they are brought out into act. Take, for example, the crimes of envy, jealousy, and malice; who does not know how often a man will wish evil to another, and imagine ways in which he would like to do him evil, before he arrives at the point of putting any one of his fancied schemes in practice? The same is also true of acts of fraud and dishonesty. A man does not belie at once, or in a single day, a whole life of just and honorable dealing, but the process of his demoralization, in most cases at least, is something like this. In his haste to be rich, or more likely still in this perplexity, if his circumstances become embarrassed, a questionable expedient occurs to his mind, — if he could only bring himself to feel that it would be right, or even allowable or safe. At first he cannot, and the thought is dismissed. But that thought returns again and again, under the same or a like form, and every time it returns a growing familiarity makes it seem less strange and less repugnant, until he is not only ready for that step, but for worse things.

The history of sin in such an individual, while it affords ample and melancholy evidence of human frailty, is one of the best vindications of human nature itself against the charge of a native and intrinsic bias to evil. It shows that actual transgression, when first proposed, is never in itself agreeable to our nature, but always more or less offensive and revolting. A strong instinctive aversion must be overcome before we can go on ; and this is commonly done, not by reconciling us to the crime. as such, but by causing our repugnance to it to be less felt through the effect of familiarity. After all, when the crime is committed, it is not for the sake of the crime, but for the sake of what we gain by the crime acting on us as a bribe ; the bribe, however, does not prevail until our sense of repugnance to the crime has been blunted by familiarity. And here it is that the demoralizing influence of ill-regulated thought appears ; for to acquire this familiarity it is not necessary that we should do anything, it is not necessary that we should stir a finger ; it is only necessary that we should go over the mischief we are meditating in thought (which we are foolish enough to suppose can hurt nobody), and thus to rehearse, as I have said, again and again, in imagination the part we are about to play in real life. Sometimes the novice in crime thinks himself ready to act when he is not ; as appears from his hesitancy and reluctance when the moment for action arrives. If, however, this unexpected recoil of his nature does not induce him to change his purpose altogether, he knows but too well how to supply the defect in his training for sin. If we could look into his heart, we should find him at his accursed rehearsals again. A few more lessons, and the blush and the shudder will pass away, never to return.

Hence a third consideration which should impress us with the necessity of governing our thoughts is, that unless the restraint is laid there it is not likely to be effectual.

Because we maintain the sinfulness of bad thoughts, it does not follow that we must push this doctrine to the extent of asserting that the thought of sin is as bad as the deed. Unquestionably it is not. The actual perpetrator of a crime is guilty of a double offence, that of desiring to do it, and that of not restraining the desire. Nay, more ; if the evil thought is suggested from without, and immediately disowned and rejected from within, it will depart and leave no stain. Accordingly there is no occasion for the morbid conscientiousness of those overscrupulous persons who live in constant terror of falling into mortal sin from the mere passage of evil thoughts through their minds against their will. The guilt of evil thoughts does not consist in our having them, but in our indulging them, accepting them as our own, making them our own, and allowing them to remain, or to return. If, therefore, instead of doing this, we repress the thought as soon as its true character is known, we not only do not fall from our innocence, but we stand higher, or at least more firmly, than we did before, because we have been tried, and stood the trial. Let the check be put upon the thought, and we not only prevent the sin from coming to maturity, but we take the character of sin from its first beginnings; that is to say, we turn what would otherwise have been a temptation yielded to, which is sin, into a temptation overcome, which is virtue.

Those, on the contrary, who indulge the thought, and yet rely on their power and resolution to prevent it from ever passing into act, do miserably miscalculate their strength. As has been said, "There can be no doubt with any reflecting mind but that the propensities of our nature must be subject to regulation; but the question is, where the check ought to be placed,—upon the thought, or only upon the action?" Paley finds an argument for the truth of Christianity in the decisive judgment which our Saviour pronounces in favor of the former course, indicating thereby his superior wisdom.* In proof of this point he adduces the testimony, not of theorists, nor even of moralists or theologians, but of practical men and men of the world, as being well qualified by their experience and observation to form a true opinion on the subject. They all concur in the view here given, being wont to say, that, in this respect at least, if in no other, "our Saviour knew mankind better than Socrates." It is commonly objected to evil thoughts, that they inflame our desires and passions, and so make them more and more difficult of control: and this is true; but I find a still more serious objection in their influence on the principle of virtue itself. They corrupt, weaken, and destroy all power, all disposition, to control the conduct on moral grounds, the only restraint left being a regard for appearances, or mere worldly interest. Need I say, he who puts his virtues under the keeping of this principle makes a shepherd of the wolf, who may indeed be vigilant and active to keep off other depredators from the flock, but only to devour them all himself.

After all, the weightiest consideration which should lead us to govern our thoughts is that which religion suggests; they are known unto God, who will call them into judgment at the last day.

Something, doubtless, would be gained, as regards the duty in question, if we would merely give heed to that apothegm of Pagan wisdom, "Reverence thyself." For he who knowingly tolerates in himself what he would be ashamed to have others know, shows that he has less respect for his own good opinion than for that of the world. But this is a small matter compared with indifference or disregard for the good opinion of our Maker and Eternal Judge. We believe that he is everywhere present, that his eye penetrates the darkest chambers of the soul, yet still indulge in thoughts and imaginations which we are careful to hide from our fellow-men, from dread of their rebuke or scorn. Is man more than God? Is it in mockery that we come before him and say, "Search me, O God, and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts, and see if there be any evil way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." Consider, too, that all the consequences of evil thoughts are not revealed in the present life. We have reason to hope that some of our guilty actions, and some of the temptations to our guilty actions, will cease with the body which is their necessary occasion and instrument; but the body is not necessary to our evil thoughts. The mind, the soul, will go on thinking still, even in its disembodied state, and thinking as it did here, and take its place according to the spirit and tendency of its thoughts. Is not this what the Scriptures mean when they say, "Therefore, judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, who both will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and will make manifest the counsels of the hearts: and then shall every man have praise of God."

Shall I be told that throughout this discourse I have been insisting on a strictness and purity of conduct which is beyond the reach of mortals? Perfection here, as elsewhere, is so, I suppose; but this does not absolve us from the duty of making perfection itself an object of our aspirations, and of earnest and unremitting pursuit. And, besides, I am not speaking of what man can do by his unassisted strength; I suppose him to be sustained by faith in Christ, and the aids of the Holy Spirit. I suppose all heaven to be on his side. Because we find ourselves unequal to a duty, not being Christians, it does not follow that we should still be unequal to it if we were to become Christians, or better Christians. At any rate, we have no right to fall back on the plea of our weakness and insufficiency, until we have done what we can, — the condition not only of God's justice, but also of his mercy. And who can say that he has done all that he can? If, then, we wish to preserve peace of mind, if we wish to keep the sanctuary of the soul unprofaned, if we wish to prevent our virtues from being contaminated in their very source and to their very core, if we wish to plant a double guard round the heart, out of which are the issues of life, — let us maintain inviolate the purity of our thoughts, without which there can be no innocence, no security, no entrance into heaven, and no heaven to enter. "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found; call ye upon him while he is near. Let the wicked forsake his way and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon."

DIFFICULTY, STRUGGLE, PROGRESS.

THOU, THEREFORE, ENDURE HARDNESS, AS A GOOD SOLDIER OF JESUS CHRIST — 2 Timothy ii. 3.

MEN would be less likely to complain of life as it is, if they knew, or would consider, what are its great objects. "Nothing," they say, "which is worth having can be obtained without difficulty and effort. We must labor for it, we must struggle for it, or else not have it." And this is true; and what is more, it was meant to be so. It is not an oversight or an accident: God never meant that things should come easily; he always meant that they should come hard; and they do not come any harder, in point of fact, than he meant they should. Difficulties, struggles, and hardships, toilings, strivings, and buffetings, — these are not strewed through human life any more thickly than God intended they should be. And yet, I repeat it, in view of all this, men would be much less apt, than they now are, to complain of life, if they understood, or would consider, the great ends for which life is given. The multitude, practically at least, mistake the means for the end, and then wonder that the end should be what it is; and hence no small portion of the uneasiness and discontent to be met with everywhere in the world, and the consequent decay of faith and zeal.

To guard against this error, we must consider well two important distinctions, which, in the eagerness and distractions of human pursuits, are very apt to be overlooked or neglected. In the first place, though we very properly labor and strive for this object and that, the great end of life does not consist in our obtaining these particular objects, but in the self-improvement realized in the process of obtaining them, or of making the attempt. And, secondly, while happiness is one legitimate object of our existence, progress is another: so that the great end of our being is not answered in our becoming happy as we are; our very capacities of happiness must be enlarged and elevated; and in this way we are to be fitted for a higher life.

These are unalterable conditions of the accomplishment of the soul's destiny. We may shut our eyes upon them, if we see fit, but they will not on that account cease to be unalterable conditions of the accomplishment of the soul's destiny. On the other hand, if we take care to study them out, and reflect on them, often and seriously, it can hardly fail to do something to reconcile us to the world as it is, to the unavoidable difficulties with which we have to contend, and dispose us to "endure" the "hardness" thus incurred in a better and more resolved spirit, or, in the words of the text, "as a good soldier of Jesus Christ."

Let us consider, in the first place, that, though we very properly labor and strive for this object and that, the great end of life does not consist in our obtaining these particular objects, but in the self-improvement realized in the process of obtaining them, or in making the attempt.

If we exert our faculties for the accomplishment of a particular object, and succeed, we do not accomplish one object only, we accomplish two objects, a particular object and a general object,—the particular object at which we aim, and the general object of improving ourselves. This is true whatever the particular object may be, provided only that it is a legitimate object. It may be the simplest mechanical process, still if we go through it successfully, we not only go through the process in that particular instance, but we improve ourselves, inasmuch as we acquire a greater facility in going through the same or a similar process on any future occasion. And this secondary advantage is still more apparent when the exertion called for is of a nature to put in requisition the higher endowments of judgment and intellect. If an architect builds a house or a ship, he not only builds that particular house or ship, but he improves himself generally as an architect; that is, he is better able afterwards to build other houses or other ships. So likewise if a scholar acquires a language, or masters a science, he not only acquires that particular language, or masters that particular science, but improves his own mind generally, that is, increases his ability to acquire other languages, or to master other sciences.

So far all is plain. But these premises being conceded, it follows necessarily that it is not to the ease, but to the difficulty, with which particular objects are effected, that we must look for the furtherance of the general object of self-improvement. If a merchant could gain a fortune by asking for it, or by writing half a dozen letters or bills of credit, he might gain a fortune, but that would be all. He would not improve his knowledge or capacity for business; he would not be a better merchant than he was before. And this is the reason why inherited property and money got by gambling, lotteries, or speculation proves a curse as often as a blessing. It is because men come by it so easily. If they came by it with difficulty, if they were obliged to put all their faculties to the task in order to obtain it, their faculties themselves would be sharpened and invigorated, their minds generally would be strengthened and enlarged, and their heads, of course, would be less likely to be turned by success.

Or take another example. Suppose a mathematician to be able to solve the hardest problems at a glance, and without any labor or application of mind. This, I allow, would make it possible for him to solve a greater number of problems in a given time ; but let him solve ever so many, it would not help him to acquire what is infinitely more valuable, the power and the habit of close and intense thought. It would help him to fill his mind, but it would not help him to improve or strengthen his mind. On the contrary, he would be in a fair way of becoming what is called " a learned fool " ; that is, one who has the information of a man, but the faculties of a child, or one who has a great deal of knowledge without the capacity to apply it to any useful purpose.

Hence the radical objection to those modern devices in education, the ostensible object of which is to make education easy. Happily they never do what they promise ; but suppose them to do it, suppose them to turn study into a pastime, it would only be so much the worse. The essential good of study consists in its being hard work ; for it is on that condition only that it will put the faculties to the stretch, and so bring them out more fully. Who has yet to learn that education, properly so called, does not consist in putting things into the mind, but, as the name implies, in bringing things out,—in the development of the power and habit of self-activity, self-reliance, and self-government; and to effect this object, the faculties on which these traits of character depend must be stimulated, exercised, and put to the stretch. In this case, though all the information should be lost, the discipline will remain.

Thus it appears that the very difficulties of life, of which we are so apt to complain, are converted into the means of that discipline, that self-culture and self-improvement, which is the great end of life. The particular and immediate objects of our pursuit, which are so apt to engross our attention, such as knowledge and wealth, pleasure and fame, are not ends, but means,—means to the attainment of the one great end of our being, the development of the latent energies of the soul; and this end they are adapted to promote just in proportion to the difficulty of compassing them; that is to say, just in proportion to the mental activity they call forth.

One word now on the second proposition before stated. While happiness is one legitimate object of our existence, progress is another: so that the great end of our being is not answered in our becoming happy as we are; our very capacities of happiness must be enlarged and elevated.

To illustrate what I mean, take the case of a child whose capacities of happiness, as at present developed, are exceedingly few and narrow. You would not be content with a constitution of things looking no further than to a gratification of the desires that child has already begun to feel. With reason you expect that other and higher desires will be awakened in him as his nature is more and more unfolded, and you count on the hard discipline of life as being likely to bring about this result. Could he gratify his first and lowest desires without pain, effort, or delay, there would be danger of his becoming satisfied with himself as he is. But let these be thwarted in many respects, or embarrassed with difficulty and opposition, and he is compelled, as it were, to fall back on other resources, which reveal to him, for the first time, the deeper and more essential wants of the soul. Thus are his very capacities of happiness enlarged and elevated.

And what is true of childhood in respect to maturer years is true also of every period of man's progress in respect to the further progress of which he is capable. Let all his present desires be met and satisfied without any exertion on his part, let all his present capacities of happiness be filled to overflowing without any mixture of bitterness or mortification, and he would be content to remain as he is; he would be content to stand still. Progress is the child of struggle, and struggle is the child of difficulty.

Hence in those countries where the soil and climate are so propitious as to leave hardly anything to be done by human endeavor, society is found to advance to a certain point, and there stop. Everything stagnates, merely because man, under such circumstances, is not compelled to labor by the hard necessities of his condition, by what we still persist in calling his hard lot. On the contrary, in those countries where the difficulties of life are the greatest, supposing them not to be of a nature to overwhelm and crush the very thought of success, we find that our nature is invariably developed to the best advantage, and becomes capable of the highest degrees not only of virtue, but of happiness.

Whence, then, this disposition to repine at a constitution of things which demands strenuous effort; which makes it necessary for us to put forth our utmost strength. For what else were we created? It is not, as I have said, an oversight or an accident that we are encompassed with difficulty, that obstacles meet us in every path, that we are constrained to "endure hardness." God meant it should be so; and he meant it not in anger, but in mercy. Difficulty, struggle, progress, — such is the law. In the operation of it many particular gratifications may be intercepted, but our happiness, on the whole, will be infinitely enhanced; many of our particular purposes will be frustrated, but the great end of our being will be secured ; our circumstances may not be so well, but we ourselves shall be better.

“Thou, therefore, endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ.” If I have succeeded in making myself understood, there is good reason for obeying this injunction independently of the divine command. “In the sweat of thy face thou shalt eat bread” was the primal curse under which man fell by his disobedience ; and we are still born under the same necessity. But the paternal care and love of God are evinced more, perhaps, in the nature of his curses, as they are called, than in anything else : when met, on our part, in a spirit at once just, resolved, and resigned, these curses are converted into blessings. We owe everything that is good and great and joyous in our destiny to the difficulties which have evoked the qualities on which all progress depends, and all self-reliance, and all self-activity.

You remember that one of the richest mines of the world was accidentally discovered by a peasant, as he was climbing slowly up a difficult steep. He caught at a bush to save himself, and steady his steps ; the bush gave way, but disclosed at the same time the exhaustless treasure which lay concealed underneath. And so it is in toiling up the difficult steps of human life : we shall probably catch at many things for support or security which the slightest straining will uproot. As they give way, however, they constrain us to fall back on other resources, lay bare the unfailing energies of the inner man, and make the soul conscious of itself.

Difficulty, struggle, progress, — this, I repeat it, is the law. By this we conquer; by this it is that the spirit gradually obtains ascendancy over the flesh; by this it is that the creatures of earth and dust gradually begin a heaven for themselves here; by this it is that the slaves of ignorance and fear and sin throw off the spirit of bondage, and aspire to be children of God; “and if children, then heirs, heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him that we may be glorified together.”

SINS OF OMISSION.

FOR THE GOOD THAT I WOULD, I DO NOT. — Romans vii. 19.

I do not believe that mankind, as a general rule, think so well of themselves as is commonly supposed. They often put on the appearance of thinking well of themselves, presuming that it is only on this condition they can expect to be thought well of by others; and all wish to be thought well of by others. But, after all, I do not think it would be easy to find a man, unless of the lightest and most frivolous character, who is not humbled and oppressed at times by a sense of his unworthiness, by a sense of his ill-desert before conscience and before God.

Still, in estimating this unworthiness, this ill-desert, there is one class of sins, of which few, if any, make sufficient account. I mean, sins of omission. I do not mean that men in general are disposed to deny they are guilty of such sins. Almost every one, the best men among us, are willing to confess, with the Apostle, that, oftentimes, the good which they would, they do not ; that they have left undone many things which they ought to have done. But they do not feel that mere omissions of duty are to be put on the same footing with transgressions of duty. They are willing to confess these omissions, nay, perhaps they sincerely regret them ; but it is with but little of the compunction or concern with which they would regret a positive crime. They probably know and feel that they have lost more or less by such neglects ; but they are slow to believe that they have also incurred thereby a heavy amount of guilt, and, it may be, a terrible retribution.

For this reason, I wish to speak at some length of sins of omission ; first, of their nature as sins, and then of their punishment.

And first, of their nature as sins. Sin is often defined as consisting in a known opposition to the will of God ; but if so, it follows of course that the sin is the same, whether it consists in doing what we know is forbidden, or in not doing what we know is required, for in either case we knowingly oppose God's will. Hence, also, there is an inconsistency in saying that sins of omission are either more or less sinful than positive transgressions ; strictly speaking, they are positive transgressions. The form of the sin is negative, that is, it consists in not doing ; but the transgression is positive and open ; the law is actually and knowingly and positively broken. If I violate the commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother," I am guilty of what is called a sin of omission; but it is just as much an open and positive transgression of the law, as if I should violate the commandment, "Thou shalt not steal," or "Thou shalt not kill."

It is true, and this perhaps has given some countenance to the alleged distinction, almost the only sins punished as crimes by human laws are sins of commission; but the reason of this is twofold. In the first place, the paramount object of human laws is, not to enforce morality, as such, but to secure social order; which is done, for the most part, merely by prohibiting such actions as subvert or disturb social order. And, in the second place, the virtues required of us are seldom capable of being so defined that they can be made to take the form of positive law. Thus the virtue of benevolence makes it to be the duty of every one to relieve the distressed according to his ability; but what human law can prescribe beforehand to whom, and precisely how much, you or I must give in order to fulfil this duty. Besides, our virtues depend, in no small measure, on the inward part of the action, — on the motive or intention; and motives and intentions are, for the most part, beyond the reach of human jurisdiction. They must be left to be rewarded or punished by conscience, and by Him who looketh on the heart.

For these reasons, human laws are content, for the most part, if they can only restrain men from the commission of crime: but not so, morality; above all, not so, Christian morality. In the Parable of the Talents it was no excuse in the case of "the unprofitable servant," that he had not wasted or misused his talent; he was "cast into outer darkness" because he had not added to his talent, because he had not used it aright, because he had buried it in the earth. A Christian is not made up of negative qualities; it is not enough that he abstains from evil, he must do good: "Therefore, to him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin." Even if a man were to keep the Ten Commandments ever so strictly, it would not make him a good Christian; at best, it would only make him a good Jew. The reason is that that ancient summary of the moral law relates, for the most part, to what is forbidden. A man may keep all the Commandments, yet not fulfil one of the Beatitudes; and in this case, without undertaking to say what he would be, it is certain what he would not be: he would not be a Christian. A man is not a good man, merely because he is not a bad man; at any rate, he is not a Christian. A Christian, I cannot repeat it too often, is not made up of negative qualities; he is not a Christian by virtue of what he has not done, but by virtue of what he has done, not by virtue of what he is not, but by virtue of what he is. The whole drift of the Sermon on the Mount is, to show that the external and negative morality which satisfied "them of old time" would no longer satisfy. Under the Gospel, it is not enough that we do not hate our enemy, which is negative morality: we must love him; it is not enough that we do not return evil for evil, which, again, is negative morality: we must "overcome evil with good." The Christian must aim "to fulfil all righteousness." I do not mean that he is likely to succeed in this; human infirmity makes it certain he will not: still his hope that his frequent failures will be forgiven is founded on the honesty and thoroughness of his purpose to leave nothing unattempted that may help to make him as perfect as possible in the sight of God.

Looking, therefore, at the essential morality of men's conduct, it is not for any one, certainly it is not for Christians, to make a distinction in favor of sins of omission, as if they were venial offences, as if they merely lessened a man's title to reward, without exposing him to blame or punishment. Whoever starts in life with the notion that nothing is absolutely required of him but to abstain from wrong-doing, forgets that he has to answer for life itself, which was not given to be filled up with wicked, or even with indifferent or unprofitable, but with worthy deeds.

Thus much of the sins of omission, considered as sins. I am next to speak of the punishment incurred thereby; that is to say, of the evils they bring on ourselves and on others.

And first, on ourselves. If we compare sins of omission with sins of commission, I do not deny that the latter inflict the most direct and the most palpable harm. A single sin of commission, a single crime of passion, will sometimes blast, in an hour, the prospects of a whole life. The same is also true of the crimes of intemperance, of inordinate ambition, of dishonesty; — their victims are everywhere; so much so, that when we hear of a man's having ruined himself, we always presume that it has been by something which he has done, and not by something which he has left undone.

But, after all, I suspect there is generally more or less of fallacy or illusion in such judgments. It may be true, as just intimated, that the self-injury caused by overt crime is more immediate and more conspicuous than that caused by culpable neglect; but it does not follow that it is greater or more certain in the long run. Who will say that the aggregate of loss, failure, and suffering occasioned by anger or revenge is greater than that occasioned by indolence; yet indolence is a vice which consists in not doing: it is a sin of omission. A French writer of great note has observed: "It is a mistake to believe that none but the violent passions, such as ambition and love, are able to triumph over the other active principles. Laziness, as languid as it is, often gets the mastery of them all; overrules all the designs and actions of life, and insensibly consumes and destroys both passions and virtues." * Besides, why is it that men are so apt to fall into sins of commission? Is it not mainly owing to neglect on their part to fortify themselves beforehand against temptation, as they might have done, and ought to have done? Take, for example, the sins of anger and self-indulgence, which do so much to swell the catalogue of human crimes; who does not know that they happen, in most cases, from neglect to cultivate habits of self-control? But all such neglects are sins of omission. Hence to this class of sins are to be referred not merely the loss and suffering which they directly produce, but also a large proportion of our other sins, together with the evils which follow in their train, including often ignominy and death. The last man that was hung for murder, became a murderer, probably, because he had neglected to cultivate habits of self-control and a proper horror for the shedding of blood; so that the radical wrong, even in his case, was a sin of omission.

There is also another general view to be taken of sins of omission, which will lead us—at least it ought to lead us — to attach more importance than we commonly do to the evils they bring on ourselves. The highest duty of man, and that which underlies all his other duties, is the duty of self-improvement, or moral progress. We are born neither virtuous nor vicious, neither righteous nor wicked, but with capacities to become either one or the other to an unlimited degree, according as we use or abuse, cultivate or neglect, the powers and opportunities put into our hands. As persons, and not things, we are to be what we become in consequence of what we chose to do or to leave undone. What we were originally made by the Creator, and what is done for us, day by day, under the forms of human or Divine assistance, are all necessary; nevertheless they result in no good to us personally, except in so far as they result in our actually making intellectual and moral progress. Moreover, in the existing constitution of things, the symbol of this progress is not that of a man floating passively on the stream, but of one struggling against it, and struggling for his life. Let him give over struggling, and he will infallibly be carried down; nay, let him intermit struggling for any considerable time, and his progress will be not only arrested, but reversed.

This being the law of man's moral life, it follows, as some of the best ethical writers have said, that the surest gauge of the gravity of a transgression is found in the influence it has on our moral progress. And here, again, I do not mean to deny that the effect of sins of commission, under this point of view, is always disastrous, and sometimes fatal. The crimes of injustice, of sensuality, of revenge, especially if deliberate and habitual, are sure to weaken, if they do not destroy, our faith and our moral and religious sensibility; and so are utterly subversive of "growth in grace." Still it may well be doubted whether these crimes, in their worst forms, are more likely to hinder or obstruct moral progress, than a neglect to cultivate those principles and dispositions, on which all progress depends.

It is a great mistake to suppose that character is spontaneous. I do not mean to call in question the existence of what are sometimes termed moral and religious instincts, as being natural to all men; but these instincts do not become character until moulded into habits. A man may have good or bad impulses; but it does not follow that he has a good or bad character, or any character, except perhaps that of fickleness and instability, which properly means want of character. There is doubtless a sense in which it is spontaneous and natural for men to tell the truth; nevertheless we do not call a man "a man of truth," until, by self-discipline, he has acquired so confirmed a habit of strict adherence to the truth, that his word can be relied on in all cases. For the same reason, though there is doubtless a sense in which it is spontaneous and natural for men to pray, we do not call a man "a man of prayer," until by constant practice prayer has become a habit with him; until he is not only surprised into it on extraordinary emergencies, but makes it a part of the daily food of his soul. Indeed, all the higher developments of character — integrity, piety, self-devotion — are so far from being spontaneous, that they can only be expected as the fruit of earnest discipline, of assiduous and long-continued self-culture. Accordingly, if this discipline, this self-culture, is neglected (which, however, is but a sin of omission), these virtues become impossible. Sins of commission interrupt us, and throw us back, in our progress; but sins of omission make it impossible that the progress should be carried on, or even so much as begun.

Again, in order to estimate aright the self-injury which sins of omission inflict, it is also necessary to take into account the bearing of these sins on our moral ability, and on our moral pleasures and satisfactions.

It is common to say, that every one can do what is right if he will; so that his failures are to be ascribed, in every particular instance, not to want of power, but to want of intention or purpose; any other doctrine, as many think, would make God an unrighteous Governor and Judge. And this is true, if nothing more is meant than merely to affirm, that all men are originally endowed with faculties equal to their work, provided only that these faculties are unfolded, trained, and applied as they might be, and ought to be, from the beginning. If, however, these faculties have been perverted, stifled, dwarfed, by any cause, — no matter whether by neglect or abuse, no matter whether by sins of omission or sins of commission, — it is plain that in every such instance the individual must lack the power, even if he should have the will, to enter at once on the highest acts or the highest enjoyments of the Christian life. Why shut our eyes on the fact, that the world is filled with the morally infirm and impotent of this description? At the same time, such infirmity or impotence is not of the nature of an excuse, because those who suffer from it have brought it on themselves, either by what they have done, or by what they have left undone. When it is said, that no one should be blamed for not doing what is beyond his strength, we are to understand by his strength, in this connection, not something which he possesses, whether he will or no, nor yet something which is given to him to be accepted passively, but something which is given to him to be acquired. Accordingly, every man's duty is to be measured, not by what he has actually made himself capable of doing, for he may have abused or neglected his powers, but by what he might have made himself capable of doing.

Thus we see, under another aspect, the wrong which a man does to his own soul by merely neglecting his duty; that is, by what are called "sins of omission." Sins of omission, as was said before, account for our falling so frequently into sins of commission; but this is not all; they absolutely incapacitate us, at least for the time, for many, and especially for the higher virtues. Take, for example, a merely unspiritual man, meaning thereby one who has merely neglected to excite and develop his spiritual capacities and aspirations, who has merely failed, from any cause, to cultivate the habit of faith and of prayer. Now we say of such a person that he is not only guilty of a sin, and that he has failed to surround himself with the sacred guards of religion as a defence against other sins, but also that he has left himself absolutely incapable, for the present, of the crowning graces and joys of the Christian life. He has not taken the preliminary steps. He has not educated himself up to the possibility of the best satisfactions of a religious experience. I do not say that such a man is incapable of believing in Christianity, if nothing more is meant by this than what is called an historical faith; but he is incapable, in the existing state of his mind, of that practical and saving faith which makes the spiritual world present to the imagination and consciousness through a living sympathy with divine things. Again, I do not say of such a man, that he cannot pray, or that he never prays ; but this I say : he cannot pray as those do with whom prayer has become by habit as the breath of life, and who feel and know that they are heard in heaven.

You will observe that I have qualified my statements of this incapacity by the words, “ for the present,” and “ in the existing state of his mind ;” but, in a practical view of the subject, these qualifications are hardly necessary. There is a considerable portion of every one’s life, during which he can hardly be said to have any character, good or bad ; that is, his habits of thought and feeling and action are not as yet determined and fixed. While the character is thus in process of formation, slight causes may essentially modify what it is to be ; but after it has been formed, the basis of it, and the pervading spirit of it, are seldom changed. Hence, whoever neglects to do justice to the spiritual elements in his nature, while his character is forming, will be almost sure, after his character is formed, to go on as he has begun. With infrequent exceptions, the more noticed because rare, we may say of men of formed characters, “ Once unspiritual, always unspiritual.” And, besides, even when an unspiritual man in after life, from fear or interest, turns to religion, the service is almost always a constrained service, mingled with regrets and self-upbraidings ; so much so, that should God forgive him in view of his sincere though late repentance, he will hardly be able to forgive himself. The only secret of a happy religious life, is a life religious from the beginning.

So true it is that a mere neglect, a sin of omission merely, in our early days when the character is taking a determinate shape, may, and often in fact does, seal our fate for time and for eternity.

One word, in conclusion, on the injury which our own sins of omission inflict directly on others. It is not pretended that they can be compared, in this respect, with many sins of commission; those, for example, of injustice and cruelty, where the injury, real or intended, which is done to others, measures the enormity of the offence. Even here, however, we should remember, according to what has been said, that injustice and cruelty are seldom committed except in consequence of some neglect,—of neglect to cultivate a spirit of moderation and self-control, and, above all, of that spirit which the Gospel makes to be the foundation and rule of social duty, loving our neighbor as ourselves. Hence it follows that a large proportion of the positive wrong done to others, as well as of that done to ourselves, may be traced, indirectly and remotely, to sins of omission, to early neglects.

Moreover, in estimating what others lose through our sins of omission, it is not enough to take into account their absolute loss. We are to consider that they lose, in this way, all that they would have gained, if we had been faithful. To apply this remark to a single case ; that of giving faithful counsel and warning to a friend in danger of falling into sin. I have no doubt, that persons in early life are often in that critical condition, in which a word, a look of encouragement or exhortation is sufficient to determine the question of their whole lives. Not to give this word, this look, is a sin of omission merely ; thousands are guilty of it without feeling much, if any, compunction ; and, in consequence, thousands are lost.

There is also another injury which our sins of omission do to others, and one which is the more to be deprecated, because it falls, for the most part, on those whom we should be most unwilling to harm ; I mean, our best friends. It is of the nature of all sin to involve the friends of the sinner, more or less, in the shame and suffering which he brings on himself. Thus in sins of commission, the drunkard, though he violates one of those duties which he is said to owe especially to himself, violates at the same time the duty which he owes to others, involving in his own disgrace and ruin all who cling to him in love, or lean on him for support. The same is also true of sins of omission. Our friends are not satisfied with knowing that we are not drunkards, with knowing that we are not addicted to gross vice of any kind. Their just pride, their affection, their partiality, often their own plans and prospects in life, are bound up with the hope that we shall distinguish ourselves, that we shall possess positive excellences of mind and character, that we shall so improve our opportunities as to fit ourselves for honorable if not distinguished places in society. Whoever wantonly disappoints this hope, fondly cherished by so many loving and anxious hearts, whoever disappoints it, though merely by indolence or remissness on his own part, that is, by sins of omission, by not doing what he knows he can do and ought to do, betrays an unkindness, an ingratitude, a baseness, which it is hard to overstate.

Let us learn, then, to regard mere neglects, sins of omission, in a more serious light. And it is the more necessary that this should be impressed on all, because the sins of which I now speak are those to which good men, as well as bad men, are continually liable. They are also sins which shock no natural sentiment, which attract no considerable attention at the time, which awaken no public indignation. Yet these sins prepare the way for all other sins. The world is full of folly and wickedness; but the fountain-head of all folly and wickedness is found in an indolent, neglectful, thoughtless spirit. "For the good that I would, I do not."

Let me remind you, once more, of the Parable of the Talents. It is not necessary that you should misapply or waste your talent; if you only bury it in the earth, you must expect the doom, "Cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth."

NO HIDING-PLACE FOR THE WICKED.

BE SURE YOUR SIN WILL FIND YOU OUT. — Numbers xxxii. 23.

LESS is done towards repressing crime by merely increasing the penalty than might, at first thought, be supposed. The reason is, that penalties are for the detected alone ; but most persons in deliberating on crime count on escaping detection. Hence the importance of exposing the vanity of this expectation. I think to be able to show that the wicked in no case have a right to count upon concealment as an ultimate ground of security and peace. “Be sure your sin will find you out.”

In cases of heinous crimes this, I suppose, will be generally admitted. When the deed is of such a nature as to outrage human feeling, and incense the community as one man, it is hardly possible that the perpetrator should escape. His guilt may come to light by what seems to be the merest accident, and hence it is sometimes thought, that his being detected at all is a mere accident: but this is a mistake. In such a case there are innumerable accidents, as they are called, any one of which may betray the culprit; and where, in a highly excited state of the public mind, there are innumerable accidents, any one of which may betray the culprit, it is not a mere accident, but amounts to moral certainty, that some one of them actually will. Thus, if a man has committed murder, or highway robbery, you may say it is a mere chance, that he was overheard plotting the crime, or that he was betrayed by an accomplice, or that he was seen lurking about the spot, or that anything was afterwards found about his person, or his residence, leading to his conviction: and so of any one of the thousand possible ways of detection. But that he should actually be detected in some one of these thousand possible ways is not a matter of chance, but of moral certainty.

With regard to minor offences, which create no public alarm, and lead to no special investigations, the offender, it is true, may often go, for a time, not only unconvicted, but unsuspected. Mark, however, the issue. The secrecy and impunity with which the deed is done will infallibly encourage and embolden him to repeat it under other circumstances, and with greater and greater aggravations, multiplying at every step the chances of discovery, until discovery, as in the case before mentioned, becomes morally certain. Felons have confessed on the scaffold, that they stood there in consequence of the misfortune of not having been detected in their first and slightest deviations from rectitude. The delay operated only as a decoy of the Evil One. It was the patient waiting of the Tempter, that his victim might become more entirely and hopelessly involved, before the snare was sprung.

But enough respecting crimes of which the laws take cognizance. Let us pass to the consideration of those offences which are punished, for the most part, by loss of reputation or loss of confidence.

And here, again, we do not suppose that every particular act will be detected or suspected: if it were so, it would do more harm than good. Men are sometimes surprised, over-persuaded, or betrayed into single acts which have little or nothing to do with their real character; that is to say, with their habits of thought and feeling and conduct. Thus, from momentary inadvertence, or misinformation, or mere physical depression, a man may be guilty of a single act of meanness, though in his nature and disposition the reverse of mean. And the same is also true of single acts of servility, rudeness, injustice, cruelty, excess. Now we do not say that every such act will be reported and believed; for the public, at least the best part of the public, is slow to credit rumors which are contradicted, or seem to be contradicted, by the whole tenor of a man's life. And this is well. No good would come from the occasional lapses of worthy men being in everybody's mouth. It is not necessary as a warning to beware of their society, for there is no danger in the society of such men; and, besides, it would lead to substantial injustice, because it would lead to charges or suspicions implicating the whole character of men whose character is in the main sound.

No doubt one of the consequences is, that while bad men often pass for being worse than they really are, good men quite as often pass for being better, or at any rate for being more faultless or immaculate than they really are;—a remark which is especially applicable to the great names of history, where only the leading and characteristic traits are given. But this, too, is wisely ordered, as it helps to keep up the standard of virtue;—not only of that virtue which has been, but also of that which is to be. Hence the repugnance so generally and so properly felt at the officiousness of those who seek to bring to light the infirmities and inconsistencies of really great and good men, now no more; especially when the reputation and memory of these men have come to be regarded as part of the moral wealth, as well as of the just pride, of their country.

Let it be, then, that single acts often are, and of right ought to be, buried in oblivion, especially when they do not represent the real character: but not so, with the character itself;—if that be bad, “be sure your sin will find you out.” The scoffer, the intriguer, the sharper, the libertine,—are they not known? I do not mean, every particular offence they have committed, but what sort of men they are. Of course, the usages of what is called good society will not allow us to tell them so to their faces: nay more, these usages often lead us, far beyond what is necessary or right, to pay an outward respect to persons for whom no inward respect is felt. But listen to men’s speeches in their places of business, or in social intercourse, or in the family circle, and you will find that they are not quite so regardless of moral distinctions, that they are not quite so much the dupes of hollow pretension, even when upheld by wealth and influence and show, as might at first sight appear.

Instances in which individuals have succeeded for any length of time in hiding their true character from the world are much more rare than is commonly thought. Take, for example, the vices of dissipation and excess,—how almost invariably do they betray themselves in the looks, the gait, and the decaying health, as well as in the wasted fortunes, of their victim! The mark is upon him, beyond the power of cosmetics, or grace of manners, or social position, to conceal. And even in respect to the vices of craft and dissimulation,—who does not know that it is of the nature of the plausibility and address which these imply to awaken distrust? so that, though a mist may thus be thrown around the character which will prevent anything from being distinctly seen, it will only be that everything may be suspected. I do not say, you will observe, that every bad action of such a man will come to light, but only that his leading propensities will; and after this, that is, after his neighbors have begun to look upon him as addicted to craft and dissimulation, depend upon it, for one bad action which he commits without being suspected, he will be suspected of twenty of which he is wholly innocent.

It will be objected, perhaps, that I have not allowed enough for the wonderful abilities of bad men, by which they are able to elude or baffle discovery. Let me begin my reply to this remark by protesting generally against that senseless cant, which would make every knave a man of talents, and talk about there being more ingenuity and mother wit in prisons than in colleges. Undoubtedly here and there an individual may be found, among the self-abandoned, of more than ordinary native power, who, in different circumstances, and under a different training, might have made himself a useful, and perhaps a distinguished member of society. But, even in such cases, it is of the nature of conscious guilt to contract and cow the most gifted mind ; under the influence of which native sagacity degenerates into a vile cunning, that is proverbial for taking narrow views, and miscalculating remote consequences, and so, in the end, circumventing itself.

Of a piece with this cant about the wonderful abilities of bad men is the cant about their honor, — the honor, which, according to the proverb, is found among thieves, enabling them to trust each other with safety. Formerly, I suppose, there was more of this than there is now, or is likely to be again. Formerly superstition, though it did not keep bad men true to morality in general, often had the effect to keep them true to dark and mysterious pledges entered into among themselves. But superstition, among such persons, is now everywhere giving place to total infidelity, to a blank atheism, and this is destroying the last hold which the bad have on each other.

Under these circumstances, I might ask again for evidence of the caution or sagacity of bad men, of which so much is said, seeing that they are so ready to confide in others whom they must know to be as bad as themselves. Nay, on any principle, it would be difficult to account for such recklessness, if we did not know that daring outrages generally suppose and require an extended conspiracy ; that there are few vices which a man can commit absolutely alone ; and that, even in respect to these, there is a dreariness in crime which craves companionship at any risk. Explain the fact, however, as you will, or leave it unexplained, it cannot fail to multiply at every step the chances, that is to say, the antecedent probabilities, of exposure and public shame. "Be sure your sin will find you out."

"Curse not the king," says the Preacher, "no, not in thy thought; and curse not the rich in thy bed-chamber; for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter." The ways in which crime has been brought to light have been so mysterious, so inexplicable, as to afford to the popular mind, in all ages, the most convincing proof that an overruling Providence occasionally interposes in the affairs of men. This is true not only of the crimes which are punished judicially, but also of those which are punished by the loss of confidence, the loss of friendship, or the more terrible reprisals of public scorn and indignation. Everybody is known. The professed thieves and rogues of England make it matter of banter that, by a mathematical calculation of chances, they can tell beforehand, within the fraction of a year, how long they are likely to elude the vigilance of the police. Sooner or later everybody is known,—not only the thief, the robber, the murderer, but the rogue in a small way, the hypocritical pretender to religion, the charlatan in science, the gamester, the libertine, the swindler in genteel life,—sooner or later all are known. Indeed, so various and subtile are the means of self-delusion and self-mystification, I do not think I go too far when I say, that in many cases, perhaps in most cases, a man is sooner found out by his neighbors than by himself. This remark applies to the young especially, who, from want of experience, do not know how far they can go in vicious indulgences before a character is formed, and who therefore think but lightly of what they have done thus far, as implying nothing worse than levity or indiscretion on their part, while their friends, who understand human nature better, are mourning over them as wellnigh lost.

But I have insisted on the notoriety of crime further than my text requires: “Be sure your sin will find you out,” even if the world does not. Suppose the sin locked up in the sinner’s breast, and suppose, moreover, that he feels no proper compunction for it, it does not follow that he feels no inquietude, no anxiety. The freedom, the confidence, the peace, the self-respect of conscious integrity are gone when the integrity itself is gone. Mere reputation, whether well or ill-founded, may win applause, it is true; but applause is not likely to give much inward satisfaction to one who is conscious that it is bestowed through ignorance or mistake, and that it would be changed into scorn if the truth were known. And then there is the unceasing apprehension that the truth will be known,—a nervous uneasiness about the future, an anxious looking into men's faces to see whether they have not begun to suspect us, an ingenuity of self-torture which construes the slightest coincidence into evidence that the secret is out. So keenly is this sometimes felt, even in matters involving only the loss of property and social position, that persons who have contrived to conceal their failing circumstances from the world for years, have afterwards confessed that they never had a moment's peace until their real condition was known; in other words, that the dreaded discovery was a means of relieving their minds of a burden which had become intolerable. And so, of crime. Felons have borne about the secret of their guilt, until they could bear it no longer, and then have informed against themselves, and surrendered themselves up to justice, under the maddening conviction that the hell of reality could not be worse than the hell of suspense.

I will now go one step further, and suppose the sin not only unknown to the public, but unacknowledged and unsuspected by the sinner himself. This may sometimes happen from the influence of custom or fashion or a bad education in making men insensible to moral distinctions; especially where the sin consists not so much in what we have done, as in what we have left undone. Even in this case, however, "be sure your sin will find you out"; for its effects on your progress and happiness, and its consequences generally in the present life and the life to come, will still follow, whether you trace them or not to their true cause. Thousands, for example, lament the want of a devout spirit, ascribing it to constitutional defects, or the necessities of their condition, when, in fact, it is mostly, if not wholly, the just penalty of an habitual and voluntary neglect of the means of religion. Others, again, are cursed, they know not why, with a sceptical turn of mind, or with a misanthropic disposition, or with sordid or depraved tastes, which make them incapable, for the time, of seeing or enjoying the highest truth and the highest good. If they would look a little more closely and faithfully into their own conduct, and into the laws of the human constitution, they would find, at least as a general rule, that they are but abiding the penalty, the just and inevitable doom which follows, whether they know it or not, the indulgence of a cavilling spirit, or low desires, or the mere neglect to cultivate and cherish the social virtues. Their sin has found them out, though they have not found out their sin.

Those, therefore, who do not find out the sin from itself, will be likely to find it out sooner or later from its consequences, and see its connection with these consequences, and awake at length to their true moral condition. Remorse does not depend on the fact of our degradation, nor on our sense of this fact, but on our sense of the manner in which it has been incurred. We feel that we have brought it on ourselves. We feel that we might have done differently. We feel that we have taken the sovereign gifts of reason and freedom, and made one the pander, and the other the slave of our passions and lusts. Hence our abasement and anguish under the impending decree of Eternal Justice. And this remorse, — exult not in the thought that you can stifle or dissipate it for a while. It is the madness of one who would drug himself with opiates in the first stages of a fever; it is allowing the fire to burn on, which is burning into the very heart of your life and peace. And all such efforts must fail at last. History abounds with instances of bold bad men, whom a self-accusing spirit has overtaken at last, even in this world, and smitten them with sudden and unimaginable terrors. But suppose them to die, untouched and unreclaimed, it will not be through any incapacity or insensibility of the soul itself; but through the power of worldly objects and pursuits to blind, distract, or lull the soul. At death all these will pass away, and the soul will be left as it is, naked and defenceless in the hands of an avenging conscience and an avenging God.

This, then, is the conclusion of the whole matter.

Let no one count upon concealment as an ultimate ground of security and peace. If addicted to sin, by no cunning or address can we hope to elude the eye even of man for any length of time; much less that of God, or the scourges of a self-upbraiding mind, or those dark and shapeless forms of woe which menace us from the eternal world, and await us there. How truly and solemnly do the Scriptures say of a wicked man, that he "walketh upon a snare." "He that walketh uprightly walketh surely: but he that perverteth his ways shall be known."

THOU SHALT SAY, NO.

THOU SHALT SAY, NO. — Judges iv. 20.

HERE is one of the shortest words in our language; yet there is none which persons of an easy and yielding disposition find it so difficult to pronounce. To say it, however, is one of the first lessons which we have occasion to learn, and one of the most frequent we are called upon to practise. You can hardly mention a cause which has done more to lead men into embarrassment, distress, and crime, than disregard of this caution. And what makes it worse is, that men of the best understandings and finest natural dispositions are quite as liable as any to fall into the snare. It is not generally our judgment which is at fault in such cases. We know that the solicitation is an improper one, and ought to be resisted; still we cannot muster resolution enough to do it.

A young man just entering into life is solicited by his gay companions to take part in their dissipations. He feels that it would be wrong; that it can lead to nothing but evil ; that it ought to be resisted. And yet he cannot muster resolution enough to say, No. He consents, goes on from step to step, and in the end is ruined. An affectionate mother is besought by her children to grant them some improper indulgence. She feels that it would be an improper indulgence ; that it can only do them harm, and therefore that she ought not to grant it. And yet she cannot find it in her heart to say, No. She consents, and her children are materially injured, perhaps ruined. A person is importuned by his family, or his friends, to go into habits of living more expensive than he can afford. He knows that his resources are not equal to it. He feels that this will soon appear, and therefore that it is folly and madness in him to do it. And yet he cannot muster resolution enough to say, No. He consents, and is ruined. A man in business is importuned to be bound for another. He feels that it would be the height of imprudence ; that it would be to risk not his own property only, but that of his creditors, and this too, perhaps, without any real benefit to the person he would befriend. He feels that he has no right to do it. And yet he cannot find it in his heart to say, No. He consents, and it turns out just as he expected,—he is ruined.

All this comes from a man's not having resolution enough to say, No, when he feels and knows that this is the proper word. You must admit, therefore, I think, that the subject is of sufficient importance to engage your attention, while a few considerations are offered which should induce us all to act with more firmness and consistency in this respect.

In the first place, then, let us learn to respect our own judgment in what we do. If, on a view of all the circumstances, we think we ought to say, No, let us have the courage and firmness and independence to say it.

As we have before observed, it is not often that our judgment is at fault in such cases. We think right, but we have not courage and independence enough to act as we think; for fear that after all we may be mistaken; or for fear of the construction other people may put on our motives; or for fear of losing the favor or incurring the enmity of the persons we may disoblige by our refusal. We should remember, however, that there is a degree of courage, firmness, and independence necessary, not only to a wise, but even to a virtuous conduct. A man who dares not act according to his own convictions of what is right, for fear that after all he may be mistaken, — I will not say that he has no regard for conscience, but this I will say: he has no confidence in conscience, which in practice amounts to nearly the same thing. Besides, with respect to the construction which other people may put on our motives, if we only take care that our motives are what they should be, and that our whole conduct is in keeping, we need not entertain any apprehensions but that in the long run ample justice will be done them by all whose approbation is worth having. Nay, a person who is understood to pursue this independent course,—who is understood to act in all cases from his own convictions of what is proper and right, derives a peculiar credit from this very circumstance; so that though in his conduct he may sometimes fall into manifest error, his motives will never be called in question. Things will not be blamed in him which would hardly be tolerated in anybody else. And even the person whom you disoblige by your refusal, you will not lose his regard if he is convinced, by the firmness and consistency of your general conduct, that you refuse him on principle. Nay, he will feel, and in spite of himself he cannot but feel, a thousand times more respect for you who thus refuse his request, than for those who grant it, under circumstances, however, which convince him, that it is only because they have not, like you, sufficient firmness and independence to say, No.

I have shown that it is but the part of a manly independence to have the courage and firmness to say, No, when we are convinced that this is the proper word. I shall proceed to show, in the second place, that it is no less a dictate of prudence, and practical wisdom.

You can hardly step your foot on the threshold of life without encountering seduction in every possible shape ; and unless you are prepared to resist it firmly, you are a doomed man. What makes it still more dangerous is, that the first solicitations of vice often come under such disguised forms, and relate to things seemingly so trivial, as to give hardly any warning of the fatal consequences, to which by slow and insensible gradations they are almost sure to lead. As you value, then, your health and reputation, your peace of mind and personal independence, learn to say, No. You that are just entering into life, do not wait to learn it from your own bitter experience ; learn it from the example and fate of others ; learn it from the Word of God. Remember, it was for not doing this that our first parents fell ; and after them all their children, in like manner. "The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat," has been the history of sin, from its first commencement in the Garden of Eden. Inquire into the sources of human misery, study the first beginnings of crime, and, meet with it where you may, by tracing it back to its first cause you will find it to have been, in almost every instance, merely because they could not say, No, to the Tempter. Put the question to one who has wasted his substance in riotous living, put it to him who has staked his last shilling and lost it at the gaming-table, put it to the first miserable object who asks alms of you in the streets, or go into your prisons and put it to the felon there; and they will all answer you to the same effect, and almost in the same words. The burden of their confession will be, that they owe every calamity which has befallen them to their not having had firmness enough, at some turning-point of their destiny, to say, No.

As you would avoid their fate, let me then conjure you to avoid its cause. I am not now appealing to your sense of right, or the obligations you are under to society or your Maker. I am appealing to the strongest, or at least the most universal instinct in the human mind,—a desire to escape evil in your own persons; and if there were no other topic of which I could avail myself, this alone I should consider as sufficient, so clearly is the maxim which I am recommending a dictate of an enlightened and well-regulated self-love. To be sure it is easy enough to conceive of cases in which to say, No, even though we ought to say it, may give us some pain at the time. But what of that? How much better, how much more prudent to meet this evil at once, rather than suffer it to grow upon us by concession and delay, and this, too, with a moral certainty that it must be met sooner or later, and under circumstances of continually increasing pain and difficulty. If we could say, Yes, to everything, and that were the last of it, we might be inclined, very naturally and very reasonably, to a course apparently so amiable and so accommodating. But when we know that it is only to involve ourselves and our friends in the ruinous consequences of a mistake which will certainly injure, and very possibly may ruin both,—who does not perceive that it is to violate every principle of practical wisdom?

The same conduct which I have shown to be necessary to a manly independence and to a prudent regard to our own interest, I shall next prove to be in no sense inconsistent with a benevolent and truly generous disposition.

One of the most common mistakes on this subject is to confound an easy disposition with a benevolent disposition: two things which in fact are as wide asunder as the East from the West. A man of an easy disposition is so commonly merely because he will not make the effort a more firm and steady conduct requires. And why will he not make this effort? Because he will not take the trouble of making it. He yields to importunity in almost every instance from the same motive with the unjust judge mentioned in Scripture: “Lest by her continual coming she weary me.” But is this benevolence? Is it so much as an abuse of benevolence? Is it not sheer selfishness?

I know that another plea is often set up. It is remarkable of most of our weaknesses, as of our vices, that all are for claiming kindred with virtue, pretending to be the offspring of some good disposition, — carried a little too far perhaps, but still a good disposition. This propensity is strikingly exemplified in the weakness which it is our present object to expose. We choose to believe and to have others believe, that our unwillingness to say, No, arises wholly, or chiefly, from our unwillingness to give anybody the pain of a refusal; that it springs from benevolence, because it hurts our feelings to hurt the feelings of other people: so that, after all, the worst that can be said of it is, that it is an excess of benevolence.

But let us examine this plea a little more closely. It is, you will observe, because it hurts our feelings to hurt the feelings of other people that we are thus unwilling to say, No. It might hurt the feelings of other people just as much as it now does, and still if this did not, by a law of our nature, have the effect to hurt our feelings too, it is not pretended that we should experience any of this reluctance. To give a case in point. A weak mother cannot make up her mind to refuse anything to a darling child, even though she knows it will be to the child's serious injury, and all, forsooth, because it will hurt her feelings so much to give the child the pain of a refusal. Suppose it will hurt her feelings; it is certainly a strange mark of benevolence to the child to be willing to do him an essential injury, rather than to hurt her own feelings. After all, you perceive that it is her own feelings she is thinking of, and not the good of the child; nay, that she is willing to sacrifice the good of the child to her own feelings. And pray, is not this selfishness, — a little disguised perhaps, a little refined perhaps, but still at bottom a real selfishness?

A timid acquiescence in what we feel to be wrong is often the result of mere selfishness; and where it is not the result of selfishness, it is the result of weakness. Indeed, we can hardly give to any one so strong a proof of genuine friendship, as to resist his importunities to the last, when convinced that it would be to his injury, were we to consent. For it shows that we are thinking of his good, and that we have more regard for that than for our own feelings, or even for his good opinion.

Having shown that independence, prudence, and benevolence alike require the conduct I have been recommending, it only remains for me, in the fourth and last place, to urge it upon you as a matter of moral and religious duty.

suppose that the principle of duty extends to almost all our actions ; requiring them or forbidding them, as being either right or wrong. We talk of actions as being honorable or dishonorable, as being prudent or imprudent, as being benevolent or otherwise, but what is honorable or prudent or benevolent is also right. Everything, therefore, which has already been said to prove the conduct in question a dictate of benevolence, prudence, and manly independence, goes also to the same extent to prove it to be our duty, — our imperative duty.

Besides, take the words as they stand. If, considering all the circumstances, we ought to say, No, then it is our duty to say it, let the consequences be what they may. It is nothing, that the customs of the country authorize and even expect a different conduct ; it is nothing, that the world may put a false construction on our motives ; it is nothing that it may hurt our own feelings or the feelings of others. There are many other duties which we are called upon to practise at all these hazards ; but in no case do these hazards, or can these hazards, procure for us a dispensation. If it is our duty, it is our duty. If it can only be practised at great sacrifices, this is our misfortune ; but it does not annul the laws of God ; it does not destroy our obligations or make them any less binding, or the consequences of violating them any the less certain or fearful.

It is then our duty, our imperative duty to say, No, to all improper solicitations. Let us do it, therefore, because it is our duty. Let this be our motive; for but little reliance can be placed on the other motives if this be not also felt; nay, if this be not the predominant motive. Some men can never say, No, unless they are in a passion, and are therefore driven to the mortifying necessity of working themselves up into a passion before they can find the courage to do it. Again there are others, who will trust themselves to say, No, only as a matter of policy; and with whom, therefore, the question is not, What ought I to say? but, What will it be for my interest to say? There is also a third class that will say, No, — and say it often enough too, if that were all, — from mere churlishness and ill-humor; but I need not observe that this is very far from being the conduct I am here recommending. Putting aside all such considerations, let us learn to resist improper solicitations from a sense of duty. It should be enough to know that it is our duty. Let us act on this principle, and we shall never refuse except when duty requires it; but at such times our refusal will be much more decided and effectual, while it will be made under circumstances of much greater dignity on our part, and of much less irritation on the part of those whom it may disappoint.

Moreover, while we act from a sense of duty, we should connect with this feeling a conviction that it is one of religious obligation. God has required us to pursue a course of undeviating rectitude. Whoever, therefore, would seduce us from this, sets himself against God, and we must deny one or the other. Whether in such a case we should deny God, rather than man, let conscience judge.

From what has been said we must perceive, that it is alike the dictate of independence, prudence, benevolence, and duty to resist all improper solicitations. Let us learn then to say, No; and let us mean what we say; and let us stand by what we mean.

Are you solicited to engage in any pursuits, or to enter into any engagements which your consciences reject, or which you foresee will bring a cloud on your prospects of honor and usefulness? "Thou shalt say, No." Are you pressed to grant favors or indulgences to persons who have no right to ask them, or who can only be injured by them, — favors or indulgences, too, which you are not in a condition to bestow consistently with your other engagements? "Thou shalt say, No." Are you importuned to join in any amusements, to consent in any customs or concur in any measures, which you believe will sully the purity of your character or lessen the weight of your good influences, or in any way exert a mischievous effect on society?

And for your reward you will have the approbation of your own consciences, the esteem and confidence of all whose favor is worth desiring, and an escape from all those embarrassing and perhaps fatal consequences in which a more compliant conduct would have entangled you. And what shall I say more? In a better world such a course of firm, consistent, and undeviating rectitude will be rewarded by the applause of angels, the welcome of the Saviour,—“glory, honor, and peace.”

THE HEART MORE THAN THE HEAD.

KEEP THY HEART WITH ALL DILIGENCE; FOR OUT OF IT ARE THE ISSUES OF LIFE. — Proverbs iv. 23.

It is quite obvious that most men practically underestimate the influence of the heart, compared with that of the head, on success and happiness. It is also easy to account for the mistake, and, at the same time, to show that it is a mistake; and this is what I now propose to do. I propose to show that the Heart is more than the Head in all the great interests and issues of human life.

It is so, in the first place, if we look only at human dignity. We are apt, I know, to slide into a different opinion, from the habit of regarding reason as man's distinction and glory. As for the passions and affections, we are said to share them with the inferior animals; but reason belongs to man alone. Hence the natural conclusion, that reason, the intellect, the head and not the heart, is the principal thing.

But this conclusion, however natural, is unfounded. There can be no doubt that what constitutes the distinction and glory of man may be traced ultimately to his reason. Still his highest distinction and glory are not found in his reason as manifested in mere understanding, but in his reason as manifested in his active and moral powers; that is to say, in his sentiments, dispositions, affections, after they have been informed and transfigured by reason. When we are told, as above, that we share our passions and affections with the inferior animals, we are told one of those half-truths, which are often found to be among the most pernicious, certainly among the most seductive, of errors. I do not deny that animals have what may be called the shadows, or, if you please, the germs, the beginnings of some of the human passions and affections: such as gratitude and resentment, the love of society and the love of offspring. But in animals these springs of action always operate as blind instincts; they are never unfolded by thought, as in man, into intelligent and moral principles, and never can be; and therefore can never properly be represented as being the same in animals as in man, though called by the same name. Moreover, there are some passions and affections in man, which not only suppose reason, but are founded on it; such as the love of truth, the love of beauty, the love of virtue, and the love of God; of which animals do not have, and cannot have, even so much as the beginnings or germs. Accordingly we say, that the proper human passions and affections, some of which are founded on reason, and all of which are touched and illuminated by reason, are not shared by the inferior animals; that there is nothing among the animal instincts which answers to what is meant by the human heart; and furthermore, that it is in the distinctions of this heart, and not in those of mere understanding, sagacity, cunning, that the loftiest qualities of human nature are found.

Some may object with confidence, that compass and reach of intellect are certainly elements of power, and that power exalts, if it does not bless. But is it so clear that compass and reach of intellect, simply considered, are elements of power? Can you not conceive of persons, have you never met with persons, who are very knowing, yet very inefficient and weak where anything is to be done? I am afraid it may sound like affectation or pedantry to call in question the often repeated aphorism of Lord Bacon, that "Knowledge is power." Nevertheless, knowledge is not power, personal power, but only one of its instruments. The power is not in the knowledge, but in the moral qualities or the passions which accompany it, which lie behind it, constituting what is called force of character. Without this force of character, which resides in the impulsive part of our nature, all the knowledge in the world would not make a man personally powerful either for good or for evil. I do not deny that the highest order of greatness among civilized men supposes high intellectual endowments; but it supposes them just as the highest order of greatness among savages supposes gigantic strength and stature. It supposes them, not as the essence, but as the instrument of greatness: the essence of greatness, always and everywhere, is a great spirit. Where this exists in an eminent degree, that is to say, where there is a union of courage, self-devotion, and a lofty purpose, it is amazing how much a man can do, without extraordinary intellectual gifts, to make himself really great, to impress himself on the circle in which he moves, and even on his country and the age, and this, too, not merely as a man of affairs, but as a controlling mind in church or state.

Thus much of human greatness. But if, as befits the condition and prospects of most men, we do not aspire to be great, but only to be truly happy, here I hardly need say that the heart is not only the principal thing, but almost everything. What is happiness but the sum total of the gratifications of a man's affections and desires? Here, therefore, it is certain that the heart is more than the head. Intellectual superiority has been shown to be, and we have expressly allowed it to be, one of the instruments of greatness, though not any part of the essence of real greatness ; but I am not sure that we have a right to set it down as being even so much as one of the means or instruments of happiness. You may urge that it often enlarges a man's sphere of usefulness : and so it does ; but the happiness resulting from usefulness does not depend on the amount of good done ; it depends on the spirit with which it is done, on its being done from the love of goodness. Still you may insist, that so far as happiness is made up of the pleasures of knowledge, it must certainly be greater in proportion to the extent of the knowledge. Even this, however, by no means follows. The pleasures of knowledge itself do not depend on the extent of the knowledge, or of the capacity of knowledge, but on the love of knowledge ; which brings us back again to a quality of the heart.

But enough of greatness and happiness ; it is time to speak of character. I observe, then, secondly, that the heart has more to do than the head in determining the distinctions of character.

We have just seen that men often mistake the relation which reason bears to human dignity. It is also true that they often mistake the relation which principle bears to character. There is an ambiguity in the meaning of this word, on the strength of which many will argue thus : Every man becomes what his principles make him ; but a man's principles are what he thinks to be right. Now to think is obviously a function of the head, and not of the heart, of the intellect, and not of the feelings: whence they conclude that every man is what the use or abuse of his intellect makes him to be.

In order to set aside this conclusion it is not necessary to contradict, in terms, the proposition on which the argument is based. All must agree that a man's real character depends, not on his outward actions, but on the principles from which he acts. By principles, however, in this connection, we are not to understand express, but operative principles; not abstract rules assented to as true and right, but real springs of action existing in the individual himself; that is to say, his predominant appetites, desires, affections. We aim to judge men, as far as we are able, not according to what they do, nor yet according to what they think; but according to what they incline to or love: not according to what they think they ought to love, but according to what they show they really love. Thus we do not call a man a miser merely because he saves money; for he may save money to give it away: but we call a man a miser because he saves money from the love of money. Again, we call a man generous, not because he is lavish of his gifts; for he may be lavish of his gifts from ostentation, or from political motives: but we call him generous, because we believe him to give from a generous disposition. For the same reason, we call a man cheerful and resigned, not because we understand him to have come to the conclusion that cheerfulness and resignation are good things; but because we believe that he really has a cheerful and resigned temper.

But why multiply illustrations? In our judgments of character, and especially in our more solemn judgments of moral character, it is always so. Law, human law, deals with the outward act; morality, with the inward feeling, sentiment, or propensity which prompts the act. Morality, it is true, pronounces the act to be right or wrong; it approves or condemns the outward act, but it approves or condemns it as exemplifying some good or bad affection or disposition. At bottom, what is approved or condemned is some good or bad affection or disposition. To be convinced of this it is only necessary to reflect, how instantly our gratitude for a gift is changed into indifference or contempt, on ascertaining that it did not originate, as we at first supposed, in the kindness or generosity of the giver, but in some selfish or sinister purpose: for example, that it was intended to seduce or corrupt us.

Thus it appears that all the distinctions of character, as well as of happiness and dignity, resolve themselves at last into distinctions of disposition or temper, and not of intellect or understanding, showing incontestably, as it seems to me, that the heart, and not the head, is the principal thing.

So likewise the Gospel teaches. Here, I am aware, we have no right to construe the term heart, which is of so frequent recurrence in Scripture, as suggesting of itself, as it commonly does in modern speech, the antithesis between the affections and the understanding; or, in other words, the heart in contradistinction to the head. The reason is, that, in popular language, the ancients generally, and among the rest the Hebrews, did not, like us, make the head the seat of the understanding, and the heart the seat of the affections: they made the heart to be the seat of both. Still whenever the state of the heart is referred to in the New Testament as a condition of Divine favor, or of final salvation, I believe it can always be shown, either from the connection, or in some other way, to denote a state of the affections, — a state of the active and moral powers, — and not of the understanding merely, or of the speculative convictions, or of outward service. “For he is not a Jew, who is one outwardly; neither is that circumcision which is outward in the flesh: but he is a Jew, who is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men, but of God.” The same doctrine is inculcated, and if possible still more explicitly and emphatically, in the two great commandments which sum up the whole of what is peculiar to Christian duty. "Jesus said unto him, 'Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.'"

To this some may object, that the primary conception of Christianity is that of a revelation, a revelation of truth; so that the great and all-important act of accepting it must be an intellectual act; not something to be felt, but something to be understood and believed; something, in short, which the head is to do, and not the heart.

The objection, as here stated, is certainly not without force. If the Gospel were now set forth for the first time as a new revelation, and we were called upon to believe it, or not, according as the evidence should strike our minds, it would perhaps be true, that the first act in becoming a Christian, or rather, in putting ourselves into a condition to become a Christian, would be an intellectual act. First of all, we should have to decide the question, whether Jesus really was, what he claimed to be, "a Teacher come from God;" and this decision, right or wrong, would be an act of the understanding, — of the judgment, and not of the affections. To a certain extent this was the state of things in the primitive Church: the Gospel was preached to

Jews and pagans, who had to be convinced that the old religions were false or imperfect, and that the new religion was true, before they could be said to be in a condition to become Christians. Hence, I hardly need say, much of the stress which the New Testament lays on knowing and believing, and on distinguishing between the true and the false, as the first things to be attended to. Even under such circumstances, however, though the intellectual act must be admitted to be the first act in the order of time, it by no means follows that it would be the principal act. Thousands and tens of thousands have believed that "Jesus is the Christ," without even so much as trying, or seriously intending, to have his spirit, or walk in his steps; who were, therefore, "none of His." They have not even so much as begun to be Christians: they have only begun to believe in Christianity. "Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith, and I have works: show me thy faith without thy works, and I will show thee my faith by my works. Thou believest that there is one God; thou doest well: the devils also believe, and tremble."

And, besides, I have been referring to a state of things very different from that which prevails at present in the Christian world. We are now born into a community which is Christian, so far at least as this, that the truth of Christianity is taken for granted in most of the forms and institutions of society, in the current literature of the day, in the prayers and catechisms which are taught in the nursery. The consequence is, that we begin with believing. We do not begin with doubting, or even with inquiring; we begin with believing, and the multitude never know what it is not to believe. They are not called upon to choose their religion; they do not pass from a state of unbelief or misbelief into the true belief; they take Christianity for granted from the beginning. Though they may occasionally have their difficulties about it, the multitude never think of renouncing it as a fable. With respect to them, therefore, not merely the principal, but the first and sole change through which they pass in becoming practical Christians, is a change from believing Christianity to be true to feeling it to be true, and acting accordingly. In other words, it is a change, not of the intellect, but of the affections and life; not of the head, but, as the Scriptures continually teach, of the heart.

But the objection may be made to assume another form. It may be said, that the Christian life must certainly have its peculiar principles, by which it is distinguished as the Christian life; and these principles must be understood by the believer, in order that he may act them out. A man is not a Christian, not at least in a practical sense of that word, merely because he believes that Christianity is true, or merely because he feels it to be all-important, necessary indeed to salvation; but because he knows what it teaches, and endeavors to live up to it, as nearly as human infirmity will permit. Hence it would seem, that we can have Christian affections only on the conditions of first having a Christian understanding or intellect.

Here, again, there is no occasion to urge extreme views. I have not undertaken to prove that the heart is everything, and the head nothing; but only, that the heart is more than the head. Accordingly, in my reply to that form of the objection which is now before us, it is not necessary, neither would it be wise on general grounds, to undervalue the importance of learning in its place, or of right opinions in religion, or of a sound judgment in religious matters. Right religious views are of great moment, and they are becoming more and more so in proportion as the community is becoming more and more generally educated. Nothing but right religious views will be likely to satisfy such a community for any length of time; nothing else will bear the criticism to which it will be exposed under such circumstances; nothing else can be put in harmony with the advanced state and free character of thought on other subjects; nothing else, when reduced to practice, will become in all respects the practice which Christianity requires. All this is freely conceded ; nevertheless, even here, right religious views are not the principal thing. Right religious views of themselves do not make a man to be a Christian in a practical sense of that word (that is, in the only sense in which it is of much importance whether a man is a Christian or not), but right religious dispositions. Right religious views are not the end, but the means ; right religious dispositions are the end, and right religious views are only one of the probable or possible means to that end.

I say, probable or possible means ; for, in the first place, because right religious views may lead to right religious dispositions, it does not follow that they must, or that they will in any particular case, or that they generally do. It belongs to minds more sanguine than wise to fancy that they have found at last a doctrinal system, or theory of religion which, if it were generally understood and adopted, would regenerate the world. A little more experience and observation would convince such persons, at least it ought to convince them, that the conduct of mankind is determined much less by their theories than by the customs of the society in which they live, by sympathy with their neighbors and associates, and by constitutional tendencies and prevailing tastes. Even in the matter of health or worldly prosperity, where we might naturally presume that selfishness alone would lead every one to turn his knowledge to immediate account, I do not believe that one man in ten thousand takes that course which he, in theory, is convinced is the wisest and best course. And for this reason ; — it does not happen to be the common course, or an agreeable course. Because a man believes a thing to be true or right or expedient, it does not follow that he will like to do it, or that he means to do it, or that he will do it. No doubt something is gained to Christianity by disabusing men of their ignorance and their prejudices in respect to it, and setting the whole subject before them in a true and strong light ; but not so much as theorists and dogmatists are apt to suppose. Where the Bible is so generally read, and early religious instruction is so generally attended to, as among us, the great difficulty in the way of a Christian life is not want of knowledge, but want of heart. Men have their worldly and selfish nature, and their bad passions ; and these they will continue to gratify, though they know it to be wrong, and contrary to God's word, until their hearts are changed.

Here and there an individual may be met with who first forms a theory of what life should be, and then lives it out. Under some circumstances, as in the springing up of a new religion, or of a new sect, instances of this sort are more frequent than under others ; still they constitute the exceptions and not the general rule. The general rule is, that men participate in the sentiments and character of the community to which they belong; and this, too, not so much by instruction, as by imitation and sympathy, through the heart, and not through the head. Speaking generally, men do not live according to theory or system of any kind, but according to example and sympathy. In morals, a man does not begin by forming a conception of what he ought to be, and then set himself to work to turn that conception into reality. He is won to virtue partly by virtuous impulses awakened in his own nature, partly by his worldly interests pointing the same way, and partly by the example of the good men around him; the fact of his becoming virtuous not depending on his having the right theory of virtue, or any theory. And so in religion. As a general rule, a man becomes religious, not from any theory of religion, true or false; but partly from the religious instincts of his nature, and partly from intercourse with religious men, and the many impressive experiences of life, all of which have the effect to awaken and call out his religious instincts. Take away his religious instincts, and all the teaching in the world would not make him religious; and even the peculiar form under which his religious instincts manifest themselves will be determined, for the most part, not by teaching, but by imitation and sympathy.

Do you ask again, How can a man be a Christian unless he acts from Christian principles? and how can he act from Christian principles, unless he knows what Christian principles are? I answer, that whatever apparent force or pertinency these questions may have is wholly owing to a fallacy which underlies them, and which, under another connection, has already been exposed in this discourse. You would build an argument on an ambiguity in the meaning of the term principle. The Christian principles which are necessary to Christian obedience, are not theoretical principles, dogmas, articles of creeds, but practical principles, Christian springs of action; that is to say, Christian affections and dispositions. When it is said, and said truly, that a man cannot be a Christian without acting from Christian principles, it is meant that he cannot be a Christian without acting from Christian affections and dispositions: but affections and dispositions are not taught: they are awakened, unfolded, developed. They do not depend on the state of the head, but on the state of the heart. “With the heart man believeth unto righteousness, and with the mouth confession is made unto salvation.”

This, then, is the conclusion, to which I am brought. In everything pertaining to human greatness and human happiness, to moral and Christian character and to final salvation, the heart is more than the head. The heart is the principal thing. Out of that, and out of that alone, "are the issues of life."

To some, indeed, the doctrine here laid down may be so obvious and incontestable, that my pains to establish it will seem a waste of words. But with the bulk of mankind it is not so. What young man starts in life, believing, as he should, that his success as well as his happiness will depend more on the spirit which he brings to his work, than on his genius, his ability, his industry, or his acquirements? And the popular notion of education — does it not fall in with and confirm the common mistake? Talk about giving to a young man the advantages of the best education, and the thoughts immediately run on what is taught in schools and colleges; as if what is taught in schools and colleges were able, of itself, to make a man either good or great or happy? And what shall I say of the Church? For eighteen centuries its best energies have been consumed, its best blood has been poured out like water, in the vain hope of bringing about a unity of Christian principles, meaning thereby a unity of opinion and belief; which cannot be, and, even if it could be, would only lead to evil. Meanwhile who has set a right value on "the hidden man of the heart"? who has remembered that "the end of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart"?

The public mind is everywhere troubled by the thought that neither civilization nor Christianity has accomplished anything like the good which was expected from it, and which it seemed to promise. So it will continue to be until men learn that mere refinement and intellectual culture, progress in science and progress in the arts, are utterly incompetent to exalt a people, or to make them capable of self-government, or to convert them from nominal Christianity to real Christianity. What is wanted, is the education of the conscience; and this, too, not on the side of intelligence, but of sensibility, — “a new heart and a new spirit.” The text has said it: “Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life.”

COMPROMISES.

I AM MADE ALL THINGS TO ALL MEN, THAT I MIGHT BY ALL MEANS SAVE SOME — 1 Corinthians ix. 22.

ST. PAUL speaks here of his readiness to make concessions in order to conciliate. He is willing to conform, as far as he innocently can, to prevailing customs, institutions, and modes of thought, in the hope of being able in this way to gain over more to his views. In one word, he shows himself prepared to give up something by way of compromise.

Taking the example of this apostle for my authority and my point of departure, I propose to offer a few suggestions on the morality of compromises.

My first remark is one in which all, I suppose, will concur. As a general rule, compromises of every description are to be regarded with distrust, and rejected when they can be without serious loss or inconvenience. Taken at the best they are of the nature of sacrifices, as each party is supposed to give up something which he considers of more or less importance. And this is not all. A plan or policy which is the result of a compromise is not a single plan or policy, but a mixture of plans, a mixture of policies. Now it can hardly be expected of such a medley, that it will have either unity or consistency; the several parts, instead of aiding and sustaining each other, will be very likely to interfere with and obstruct each other. Take any one of the plans originally proposed, in its simplicity and integrity, and you would probably have a good plan on the principles assumed; but mix them together, and the chance is that you will have a plan which is not a good one on any principles. Add to this, what is of great moment in a practical view of the matter, it will be a plan for the successful working of which no one will feel himself to be personally responsible. After all, it will not be his plan, though he adopts it for the sake of peace.

Accordingly, if a compromise is called for, the first question which we should ask ourselves is, whether the occasion for making it may not be avoided altogether. If we conclude to act together, we must expect to be called upon to give up more or less to each other; for it is not to be presumed that several persons will accord exactly in their tastes, their interests, or their notions of right. But it is often a matter of comparative indifference whether we act together or not. Many of our associations are entirely voluntary. A joint-stock company, a mercantile firm, a literary or scientific society,—it is entirely optional with us whether we enter into such an association or not; or, if we belong to it already, whether we continue in it or not. If we find, therefore, that we cannot enter into or retain such a connection without being called upon to make important sacrifices by way of compromise, it would be better for us, as it seems to me, to decline the connection, or to renounce it if already formed. If the association involves the compromise, and if the association is at the same time entirely voluntary, it would be better for us, as it seems to me, certainly it would be better for us as a general rule, to have nothing to do with the association.

But all our associations are not voluntary, in the sense here intended. The family, for example, is not a voluntary, but a necessary association; and so likewise, in a certain sense and to a certain extent, is the neighborhood, the church, the state. I do not mean that a man is not at liberty to quit the neighborhood in which he lives, the church to which he belongs, and even the country in which he was born; nay, it is easy to conceive of a state of things in which this would be not only a possible, but the only proper course. Suppose this course taken, however, and what would be the consequence. Simply that he would live in another neighborhood, worship in another church, be subject to another jurisdiction.

I say it must be so, because the only other alternative would be absolute solitude; it would be to refuse to worship with anybody, or to recognize any government, or any one as his neighbor; and this, manifestly, he has no right to do, because virtues and duties are enjoined upon him, as a Christian and a man, which can neither be acquired nor practised except in society. We are not at liberty to run away from society. A man has no more right to run away from society, even if the thing were practicable or easy, than to run away from his family. He has virtues and duties to acquire and practise there which are necessary to his own character and final acceptance. Every man must live in society;—I do not say, in this or that society, but in some society. We must live and act together; and this being the case, one of the first and most obvious of our duties is the duty of mutual concession in the shape of compromise.

Concessions, then, we must make; but what concessions? Neither you nor I can expect to have everything in our own way. We must give up more or less to others, in order that they may be disposed to give up more or less to us. But what are we to give up? and how much are we to give up?

or moral purpose, we should, like him, become "all things to all men." But what did the Apostle mean when he used these words? when he spake of being "made all things to all men"? Certainly it will not do to interpret this language to the letter. It must not be so construed as to intimate that he was ready to conform to the opinions and practices of the world whatever they might be, or any further than he innocently could. The question, therefore, returns: How far can we carry the spirit of compromise without trenching at the same time on the laws of Christian truth and righteousness?

To this question I reply, in the first place, by observing that we are in no danger of trenching on the laws of Christian truth and righteousness so long as our compromises do not involve anything more than the giving up of our own tastes, our own convenience, our own innocent pleasures, our own interests, even our own rights, out of regard to others, and in the spirit of Christian concession and self-sacrifice. Here, as it seems to me, there is no room for doubt, or difference of opinion. Whoever is willing, on proper occasions and in a proper spirit, to forego his own tastes and pleasures, or waive his own acknowledged rights and privileges, for the sake of peace and for the public good, is not only justified in so doing, but universally applauded. Even those who maintain that duty does not require this at our hands, must mean, not that it is less, but more, than duty requires. Indeed, I do not see how it can be regarded as more than our duty, if we are to pay any respect whatever to the example of Paul, who was "made all things to all men," who exhorts his disciples to abstain from so asserting their acknowledged liberty as to make it a stumbling-block to the weak, and who generously exclaims, on one occasion, "If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." Above all, I do not see how it can be regarded as more than our duty, if we would be followers of Him, who, though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we, through his poverty, might be rich, and who gave his life a ransom for all.

If by possibility any difference of opinion should arise respecting the principles here laid down, it must be as to our right to give up even our own rights. To say that we have a right to give up our rights, may sound to some like a contradiction; but it is a contradiction in sound, in appearance, only. If a debt is due me, I have a right to immediate payment; but most assuredly, at least in a majority of cases, I have also a right to postpone the payment, if I see fit, or to remit the debt altogether. Indeed, not to give up our rights, is to

At the same time it is proper to add what has doubtless done something to countenance, and perhaps to introduce, the mistake just exposed. Our right to give up our rights depends on their being ours exclusively. We have no right to give up our neighbors' rights without their consent, express or implied. It may be right for them to give up the rights in question, but it is not right for us to do it for them, unless in their name, and with their consent. Thus, a lawyer must insist on the rights of his clients, and, unless otherwise instructed, on all their rights, this being not merely his right, but his duty, as their agent. It is not for him to give up what belongs to others, though he might be disposed, and though it might be very proper for him to give it up if it were his own. Moreover, the rights of others are often so involved and complicated with ours, that to give up ours is to give up, or seriously to compromise theirs. Here, again, a good man will hesitate. A parent, for example, might be willing to give up one or more of his own rights, if he were sure that the loss would fall on him alone ; but if, on the contrary, he knows that, directly or indirectly, it will fall on the whole family, on all whom he represents, he will feel that they also ought to have a voice in the matter.

Again, a right may be held in common, and require to be maintained in common, and all therefore may be in some sense pledged to its defence in common, as in the case of civil or religious liberty. Here, as before, no individual can honestly act as if he alone were interested in the event. It is not only the right, but the duty of all to stand by each other, and this, too, though many, if left to act out their individual preferences, would be willing, and would choose to yield. I say, it is not only their right, but their duty; and the distinction here indicated between a right and a duty is of great moment in this connection; for though it may be true, as I have attempted to show, that it is right, in some cases, to give up a right in order to conciliate, or by way of compromise, for the good of others, it by no means follows that it would be right, in any such case, to give up a duty.

And this brings me to what may be called the pinch of the question. Have we a right, under any circumstances whatever, to go contrary to our duty for the sake of peace, or to meet those we must act with half-way, or on the plea that in a choice of evils we should take the least, or in the hope that in the end virtue and humanity will be gainers by such a course? In one word, for it comes to this at last, have we a right, under any circumstances whatever, to "do evil that good may come"?

Thus stated, it seems to me that the question answers itself. We have no such right. The New Testament says emphatically of persons guilty of the conduct here described, that their "damnation is just." I can easily conceive that the circumstances will have more or less to do in determining what a man's duty is in the exigency in which he is called to act. But supposing this point settled, as is the case in the form of the question as stated above, — supposing it to be determined what a man's duty in the circumstances is, it is as clear as day that he has no right to swerve one hair's breadth from the direction in which that duty points, come what may.

But we must not think that the annunciation of a moral truism like this will go far to clear up the great practical difficulty we are considering. The question disappears in one form, it is true, but only to come up in another. In a sharp collision of opinions and interests, of rights and duties, of reciprocal benefits and mutual obligations, may not my duty itself become changed? In such an emergency, and in order to meet and satisfy the new responsibilities growing out of it, may it not be proper for me to deviate from the ordinary rules of human conduct, on the ground, not that it is a deviation from duty, but that duty requires the deviation? May I not in certain circumstances become a party to a compromise, even as regards great moral issues, on the ground, not that the compromise will justify me in giving up my duty, but that duty calls upon me to make the compromise?

Let me suppose a case. A community, bound together by a multitude of reciprocal affections, interests, and obligations, fall into irreconcilable difference respecting a single question, and that a moral one. What are they to do?

Some may think to cut the matter short by insisting that the party which is right ought not to give up, ought not to meet the other half-way, ought not to make the smallest concessions. And this is true, supposing it to be known and conceded which party is right; but unhappily this is not a conceded point; it is the very point in dispute. The question is not, what the party shall do which is right, but what the party shall do which thinks itself right. And if you still answer, "Not concede one jot nor tittle," then you have no ground of complaint against your opponents for not conceding one jot nor tittle to you, for they also think themselves right. If it should be objected that this is assuming too much: that we have no right to take it for granted that both parties are equally sincere in their pretensions, I reply: Perhaps not. But which party are you going to set down as insincere, or as less sincere. If, as usually happens, both parties claim to be right, and give the same evidence of sincerity, is it not plain that we must regard both as sincere, or neither?

Still there are those who will recur to the argument that our duty is determined by what we think, and not by what others think, and therefore that, in a moral view, there is no substantial distinction between what we think to be our duty and what is our duty. What we think to be our duty is duty for us; what we think to be the right course is the right course for us.

But here, again, the conclusion is broader, or, at any rate, more unqualified, than the premises will warrant. I do not deny that mistake extenuates, and sometimes, perhaps, excuses wrong-doing; but it does this only on one condition; namely, that we have not wilfully shut our eyes on important and obvious facts in the case. Now in the case under consideration two of the most important and most obvious facts are these: first, that we ourselves are fallible; and, secondly, that others, no more fallible than we are, have come to a different conclusion. So far all must be agreed. If, therefore, we persist in shutting our eyes on these important and obvious and admitted facts, that is to say, pay no regard to the judgment and the consciences of others, but proceed to act on our own as if we were infallible, when we know we are not, the mistake, if we fall into one, does not make wrong to be right even for us; nay, is no excuse for the wrong. It is not mistake, properly so called, but obstinaey ; and whatever may be said of mistake, all, I presume, will agree that obstinaey is no excuse for moral delinquency of any kind.

Another ground sometimes taken is, that where two parties are at variance, only one can be right ; and consequently that a compromise supposes a departure from the right course on one side or the other. This, however, does not follow. I admit that where two parties are at variance, both cannot be right ; but it does not follow that either is so, that is, wholly right. Both parties cannot be right, but both parties may be wrong ; at least more or less so. Indeed, where the question at issue is a large and complicated one, having a multitude of connections and bearings, as is commonly the case in civil and religious dissensions, it is much more reasonable to suppose that each party is partly right and partly wrong. And if so, it would seem that each party has something of wrong to give up, and the compromise that should consist of mutual concessions of this sort would evidently result, not in a departure from right on either side, but in an approximation to right on both sides.

I have now glanced at some of the abstract and speculative objections to all moral compromises, as such. Others are disposed to take a more practical view of the subject. They will tell you that party differences are not to be settled by compromise, but by vote. The party which can command the largest number of votes has a right to have its own way in everything, on the ground that the majority have a right to govern. On this ground, some would seem to argue that the majority have a right to impose on the whole country their peculiar system not only of political expediency, but of political morals, to which the minority must submit as they best can.

But is not this the essence of tyranny, and not the less so because it is in the hands of many, and not of one or a few? What signifies it to the oppressed minority, the oppression being the same, that the name of the oppressor is Legion? Not that I mean to call in question the doctrine that the majority have a right to govern, — that is, to govern justly. But to govern justly the majority must consider the just claims of the minority, and, above all, those claims which are founded on a difference of moral conviction, and make concessions to them; as is actually done by our own and other governments in the case of the Quakers. Yet these concessions are of the nature of a compromise. Accordingly the right of the majority to govern does not exclude the necessity of compromise. The utmost extent of that right consists in the right to fix for the time being the terms of the compromise; and this they have no right to do capriciously, or with a single view to their own party maxims and preferences, but as they honestly think an impartial umpire would approve, in view of all the circumstances. If you say that nothing is due to the dissenting consciences of the minority, you have no right to find fault with the Spanish Inquisition. Often, also, the practical question is, not what either party would have things be as a finality, or if they were to begin anew, but what, on the whole, ought to be done "in the present distress."

The consideration in this connection which probably has the greatest weight with tender consciences is, that by compromising with what we think to be evil, we make ourselves, to a certain extent, parties to it. What we insist upon doing, at any rate, is simply to wash our own hands from all responsibility in the matter. But is this all that is required? Our responsibility does not consist in freeing ourselves from the responsibility, but in fulfilling the responsibility by adopting such measures as we honestly believe will be most likely to abate the evil, and in the right way. A mere solicitude to save ourselves from responsibility would indicate but too clearly, that the motive which in fact determines us is not the philanthropy of which we boast, nor yet the justice to which we appeal, but a selfish desire to escape suffering in our own persons, here or hereafter. When men talk about "washing their hands" from all participation in a supposed wrong, without doing anything, or attempting to do anything, to remove or remedy or lessen the wrong, it always reminds me of Pilate's conduct at the trial of Jesus.

I have spoken of compromises in general; not of any particular compromise. I have endeavored to treat the question dispassionately as a purely abstract one, coming up in the study of Christian ethics. I am aware that there is often less difficulty in laying down general principles than in applying them with the limitations and qualifications which the circumstances of the case require. Still something is gained by clearly apprehending the principles, — the applications must be left to the occasion as it arises; and let me add, that a right application of the principles in the most perplexing circumstances will mainly depend, not on a morbid sensitiveness to the question at issue, nor yet on casuistical subtlety, but on downright honesty of purpose, a sound understanding, and a truly generous and magnanimous spirit. It is easy to conceive of compromises from which we should turn away, as from a compact with the Evil One. Nevertheless, without a spirit of mutual concession in constant exercise it is plain that no family, no neighborhood, no community, can subsist for a single day in tolerable comfort and quiet.

Undoubtedly there is danger that our compromises will lose all moral significance by originating in low, selfish, and worldly inducements. Undoubtedly there is danger that we may be ready to concede truth and justice and humanity, in order to save our interests and our pleasures; on the ground that truth and justice and humanity are mere sentiments, mere prejudices, while interest and pleasure are real and substantial things. Undoubtedly there is danger that, while we talk about exercising mutual forbearance, and becoming "all things to all men," as the Gospel requires, we may all the time be acting from motives which the Gospel disowns and condemns. The existence and prevalence among us of compromises of this description would be one of the most alarming symptoms of national decay and ruin: which may God avert! At the same time, the spirit of compromise, righteously carried out, as it gave birth to our Union, is absolutely indispensable to its continuance. Let not the eye say unto the hand, "I have no need of thee;" nor again, the head to the feet, "I have no need of you;" but let the whole body, fitly joined together, and compacted by that which every joint supplieth, according to effectual working in the measure of every part, make increase of the body unto the edification of the whole in love.

CONDITIONS OF SUCCESS IN LIFE.*

I RETURNED, AND SAW UNDER THE SUN THAT THE RACE IS NOT TO THE SWIFT, NOR THE BATTLE TO THE STRONG, NEITHER YET BREAD TO THE WISE, NOR YET RICHES TO MEN OF UNDERSTANDING, NOR YET FAVOR TO MEN OF SKILL; BUT TIME AND CHANCE HAPPENETH TO THEM ALL. — Ecclesiastes ix. 11.

THIS is one of those gloomy and despondent views of human life in which Ecclesiastes abounds. At first sight it would seem to inculcate the extreme doctrine, that success is wholly dependent on circumstances, and even on accidental circumstances, and not at all on ourselves. Thus understood, I need not say, it shocks our sense of justice, and contradicts our general experience. Moreover, we feel that if received in this sense, especially by those just entering into life, its only effect must be to discourage effort, to lower men's aims, and to subvert the foundations of a just self-reliance. What the writer meant to inculcate was probably this: as it is not for man to read the future, or direct his steps, he must be content with doing as well as he can, and leave the rest to that Providence which shapes and determines all events.

* It is customary to deliver a Farewell Discourse in the College Chapel to the Senior Class, on the Sunday before they leave. This and the two following sermons were preached on those occasions.

Understand the text, however, as we may, it very naturally introduces the question how far a man's success in life, including his character as well as his outward condition, is to be regarded as his own work?

This is not a subject on which to advance hasty or extreme opinions. I am willing to start with the concession, that there is a large pre-ordained element in the life of every individual, and a still larger one in the life of every community. It certainly does not depend on the man himself in what place or condition he is born,—whether in savage or civilized life, whether in a Christian or pagan country, whether in the midst of abundance, or in the midst of want, whether in a virtuous and happy home, or in the haunts of vice; and we must be beside ourselves not to see that these things have much to do in making a man what he becomes. Everybody ascribes a great deal, and the older we grow I believe we generally ascribe more and more, to differences of race, to hereditary or constitutional aptitudes and tendencies, to the power of education, example, custom, and even to what the world calls good or bad fortune. So Lord Bacon: "I did ever hold it for an insolent and unlucky saying, 'Every man maketh his own for tune,' except it be uttered only as an hortative or spur to correct sloth. For otherwise, if it be believed as it soundeth, and that a man entereth into an high imagination, that he can compass and fathom all accidents, and ascribeth all successes to his drifts and reaches, and the contrary to his errors and slippings, it is commonly seen that the evening fortune of that man is not so prosperous, as of him that, without slackening of his industry, attributeth much to felicity and providence above him."*

Many are tempted to go further. "We talk," they will say, "about what we are going to do, or be; after all, however, it does not depend on ourselves. We are, to a great extent at least, the creatures of circumstances, — predetermined, inexorable. The key-note to almost every man's life is pitched, long before he can properly be said to have had anything to do with it. We do not make ourselves, we find ourselves: we have to take ourselves as we are, and make the best of it. We think it of great moment to be Christians; but if a man is born in Constantinople, or Peking, or Timbuctoo, what likelihood, we had almost said what possibility, is there that he will become one? Take the inmates of a penitentiary, — if you could know all their antecedents, you would not wonder, in respect to many of them, that they are there. You may say, that a strong will sometimes triumphs over the most formidable obstacles of education and physical condition. And so it does; but what is a man to do, who is so unfortunate as not to have a strong will? we do not deny that the mind has great influence over the body; we only say, in reply, that the body has great influence over the mind, and that the influence begins on this side. A single drop of blood in the wrong place makes all the difference between a philosopher and a maniac."

But enough of this. Very little practical wisdom is ever gathered from the consideration of supposed and extreme cases. It is not because the statements themselves are untrue, but because they are inapplicable, at least in an unqualified form, to our own condition and prospects, or to what may be termed the average of human life. A larger survey and juster appreciation of things will convince us that there is nothing in "the doctrine of circumstances," rightly understood, to discourage effort or destroy a proper degree of self-reliance, especially where this self-reliance recognizes a Divine support, holding that, in some mysterious way, it is "God which worketh in us both to will and to do."

For, in the first place, if you say, it is the circumstances which make the man, you must also admit at the same time, that it is the man who often makes, and can always modify, the circumstances. There would seem to be no room for a real difference of opinion here. All agree that some of the circumstances materially affecting our condition and progress are determined for us, and not by us. It is so, for example, as regards the place of our birth, the form of society, government, or religion under which we are brought up, whether we are born with a strong and healthy constitution, or with a feeble and sickly one, what are our natural abilities, and what our natural temperament. Even in regard to such circumstances, however, it would be idle to pretend that we cannot alter or modify them in any manner or degree. In point of fact men are doing this very thing every day, and every hour. Look where you will, and you cannot help seeing that the bulk of mankind are doing more or less to improve their natural advantages, and to correct or guard against their natural disadvantages, and with more or less success.

These remarks apply especially to those circumstances which have most to do in making the differences existing between individuals belonging to the same class, living under the same laws, professing the same creed, and sharing in the same measure of general civilization. And this, let me say in passing, is the only aspect of the subject under which it is of much practical moment to you or me. With us the question is not, whether we shall be civilized men, or savages, for that point is already settled, — we are civilized men, — but what sort of civilized men we shall be. So likewise as regards religion, the great question, with us at least, is not, whether we shall be Christians or Mohammedans, for that again is a settled point: we are Christians, at least in the sense of belonging to Christendom; the only question still at issue being, what sort of Christians we shall become. Granting, therefore, that we are Christians and not Mohammedans merely because we were born and brought up in a Christian country, how happens it, I still ask, that one is a better and happier Christian than another? Is it not, in great measure, because he takes more pains to inform his mind, to subdue his passions, to regulate his habits? because he selects better companions and chooses to follow better counsels? because he takes care to surround himself with better means, and seeks out better opportunities, of self-improvement, and a better field of labor and usefulness?

I know how slow men are to give up their theories. Probably many will still insist that the whole is nevertheless resolvable into the effect of circumstances. If a man is any better or happier than the multitude immediately around him, it must be because, though his general circumstances have been the same with theirs, he has somehow or other come under the influence of better special circumstances. Be it so. I only ask you to consider to how great an extent these better special circumstances are of his own choosing, of his own moulding, and often of his own creating. The general circumstances determining the class or order to which we shall belong may, and often do, originate in what others have done for us; but the special circumstances, determining our relative character and condition as individuals of that class or order, are almost always our own work. For instance, that we belong to the educated class is probably owing, in a majority of cases, to our parents; but whether we, as individuals, are to be a credit or a disgrace to that class, is left to depend almost wholly on ourselves.

There is also another train of thought, which, if followed out, leads to the same general conclusion. The influence of circumstances, however important and indispensable must not be regarded as annihilating, nor even as necessarily limiting or abridging, human power. On the contrary, this very influence is continually resorted to as an instrument of human power, and used as a means of extending it. True, a portion of our circumstances are pre-determined, imposed, inevitable; but it is also true that another portion of them are variable, subject more or less to our control, to be shaped, rearranged, and directed as we see fit. In this way we can, if we see fit, take one set of circumstances and play them off against another, so as to neutralize, or essentially to modify, the effects even of those circumstances which can neither be prevented nor altered in themselves. To say that we can do this is not enough; we are doing it continually. Every time the agriculturist changes his mode of tillage, every time the physician sits down to write a prescription, every time the statesman proposes the enactment of a new law, every time the philanthropist founds a new institution of mercy or beneficence, — what is it but playing off one set of circumstances against another, that the whole may be brought under human control? What, indeed, is civilization itself but the result of a succession of triumphs effected by such means, — triumphs of mind over matter, of man over nature! The best interests of a savage tribe, and sometimes its very existence, are put in jeopardy by the ill success of a single hunting party, by the accidental failure of a single natural production, by the unwonted rigor of a single winter, — contingencies which it has neither the skill to foresee nor the means to provide against. But in civilized communities it is not so. Every step in science and the arts, every step in education and civil government, is a step in the direction of rescuing life and society from the dominion of nature and chance, and bringing the whole under human calculation and control, and this, too, by making a wise use of circumstances.

It would do something to save theorists from confusion and mistake in speaking of the power of circumstances, if they would only bear in mind how much is included under that familiar term. If you say that man is the creature of circumstances, it must be with the understanding, that the greatest and most effective of these circumstances is the man himself. And by the man himself I here mean not merely his physical constitution, including his brain and nervous temperament, and his innate aptitudes and predispositions, but also the habits he has contracted, the acquisitions he has made, even his humors and caprices,—in short, whatever he is, or has become, at any given moment. This, I hardly need say, is one of the circumstances, under the influence of which he is called to act, and beyond all question the greatest and most effective of them all in its bearings on his present conduct and his future prospects. Now will any one seriously pretend that men have nothing to do in determining what their habits and acquisitions and tempers shall be? Is there no such thing as self-culture? If not, why are we here? Why this vast, complicated, and expensive apparatus of churches and schools and colleges, of libraries, museums, and laboratories? And do not think that in thus referring to the means of education I have forgotten my argument, which is to show, not what can be done for men, but what men can do for themselves. It is a superficial view of things which leads to the distinction between education and self-education. In point of fact, all education is self-education, the only difference being, that education in churches and schools and colleges, and amidst libraries, museums, and laboratories, is self-education under the best advantages.

In making so much to depend on ourselves, notwithstanding the important part which accident and external necessity play in human life, I trust I shall not be suspected of meaning to involve myself or you in the perplexities of the old metaphysical puzzle about free-agency, the liberty of indifference and absolute self-determination. Let those who have nothing better to do continue to sharpen their speculative faculties on that insoluble problem; my aim in this discourse is wholly practical. No sensible person denies or questions the power of circumstances. It is not pretended that you or I can do substantial and lasting good to ourselves or others, simply by willing it, or by merely saying the word. Change of character is a vital process; we have grown into our present set of habits, and in order to change them, we must grow into another set of habits, and growth is not an act of the will; — it is the slow result of influences, as well from without as from within. We must avail ourselves of the proper occasions, instrumentalities, circumstances. To argue, however, that what we do by such means we cannot be said to do at all, because we do it through them, is a mere abuse of language, an affront to the practical understanding of mankind.

The doctrine of circumstances here laid down extends, with some obvious qualifications, to heavenly things and the spiritual life. That we have the means of “the great salvation” is wholly owing to the Divine condescension and mercy, and not to any merits or any exertions on our own part; but we do have them. They are not to be given; they have been given. The Scriptures, the Church, the sacraments, faith, prayer, the example of holy men, doing good in the name of Christ, — these are the acts and influences by which men are trained for heaven. And they are open to all. They are not forced on this one or that one, on you or me, but they are open to all. Who will say, that it does not depend on himself whether he avails himself of them or not, and in what spirit he avails himself of them, and therefore to what effect? I am recommending no way of salvation but that which the Gospel points out: “And the Spirit and the Bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come: whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely.”

“Whosoever will”! In what better terms could the Gospel confirm and sanction every word that has here been spoken? Let us not go about to imagine cases of moral and spiritual destitution and despair. There may be such cases, but it is not so with us. We must also make a distinction between worldly success and acceptance with God. Whether you are to be rich or poor depends on others, as well as you; but if rich, whether you are to be a good rich man, or a bad rich man, and if poor, whether you are to be a good poor man, or a bad poor man, depends, under God, on yourself alone. Even with each one of us, I do not mean to deny that there is still a fearful uncertainty as to what he is to be in the sight of God; but I insist that this uncertainty does not come in between the will and the act, between the will and the success: it lies behind the will. The uncertainty consists in this, whether we shall will, and persevere in that will, or not. Where there is a will, there is a way.

Away, then, with that fatalism which makes man the creature and sport of circumstances he has had no voice nor influence in determining. Never for a moment believe that we are in the hands and at the mercy of the blind forces of nature. It is not religion, it is atheism, which makes nature everything, and man nothing. "And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul." That "living soul" is not a product of nature, nor yet one of the many forces of nature: it is a force distinct from nature, confronting nature face to face, and often in direct conflict and struggle with nature. In this conflict and struggle the secret of the soul's strength consists in believing, in feeling, that its strength is not from nature, but from itself and from God. Where this faith, this feeling, is intense, even error and sin cannot cripple the soul's invincible energy; their only effect will be, as in the case of the conquerors and scourges of mankind, to convert what would otherwise have been a Divine into a Satanic power, — terrible even in its apostasy and perversion. The body, as it is formed "of the dust of the ground," belongs to nature, and is subject to the laws of nature, acting as it is acted on; but the soul, the inspiration of the Almighty, vindicates its relationship to a higher order of existences by being essentially self-active and free. Self-activity and freedom, however, are no protection against abuse and ruin. To be able to look forward into a dark and untried future without presumption and without fear, we must feel and know that "greater is He that is in us, than he that is in the world;" — without presumption, because always ready to exclaim, with the Apostle, "Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me;" and without fear, because always prepared to take up the testimony of the same Apostle, "Not that I speak in respect to want; for I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: everywhere, and in all things I am instructed, both to be full and to be hungry, both to abound and to suffer need. I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me."

Though my subject is a general one, it is directly and specially applicable to those who, having completed their College course, are now full of the thought as to what their future condition shall be. Life is before them. Is that life a lottery, a game of chance? Is it something which they are to accept or submit to as a fatality. Or is it something which they are to achieve? My young friends, it is neither one nor the other exclusively; it is all three, strangely blended together.

It is to no purpose to shut your eyes on the uncertainty and vicissitude which are impressed on all earthly things. How many have won the highest university distinctions, like Kirke White, merely to die? How many, after graduating with the fairest promise, have lived merely to disappoint it, and this, too, without any fault of their own, but through the fault of others, or some infelicity of manner, or temper, or intellect, which did not interfere with their success here, but was fatal to it in the world? It is certain that "the race is not always to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favor to men of skill, but time and chance happeneth to them all." I do not say this to damp a generous enthusiasm, or to dispel, if I could, the dreams of life in which the young are apt to indulge. I honor, I revere those dreams, as often leading to their own fulfilment, nay, as coming much nearer to the truth of what life ought to be, and might be, than the vulgar experience. But this I say: I would not give much for a young man's chance of eminence whose pillow is never wet with tears at the thought of the difficulties to be overcome. And besides, to minds of the highest order, there is a strange fascination in the prospect of hardship and difficulty; they like life the better for its struggles and its perils.

My friends, whether you look to public or private life, my last words to you shall be words of encouragement and benediction. The final cause of the chances and changes of this mortal life is to evoke and strengthen that principle in your nature, which is superior to them all. Take counsel of your humility; take counsel of your caution; but never take counsel of your fears. More than half of the obstacles in your path are like a rotten stump in the woods, which a timid man takes for a ghost, and runs away. A brave man walks up to it, and finds it to be what it is. Never be appalled and unmanned by what is said about risks, and difficulties and competitions. Never retreat into a narrow and obscure walk, with its only one chance of success and usefulness, as if it were the safer for that. Push forward, if you have the common consciousness of ability, into the great thoroughfares, where, though a hundred chances of success and usefulness should fail, a hundred chances are left. And take with you our best wishes and our best prayers that you may succeed in the best things. I will not commend you to the favor of the world, or to the promise of your own genius and activity, for all these may prove vain; but "I commend you to God, and the word of his grace," who alone "is able to keep you from falling, and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory with exceeding joy."

ON THE CHOICE OF A PROFESSION.

LET EVERY MAN ABIDE IN THE SAME CALLING WHEREIN HE WAS CALLED. — 1 Corinthians vii. 20.

IN seasons of unusual religious excitement and earnestness men are tempted to regard all political and social distinctions, and all ordinary secular employments, as abolished or suspended. So it was in some parts of Germany at the breaking out of the Protestant Reformation. So it was in the Corinthian Church at the first planting of Christianity. The Apostolic injunction addressed to that church, and recorded in the text, may be considered as directed generally and in principle against a twofold form of error especially prevalent at such times.

In the first place, it is directed against the error of making religion a business or profession by itself, leaving us no time or thought for anything else. Of course, I do not mean that anything whatever should be allowed to come into competition with religion; or that there is any extravagance in the doctrine which teaches that religion is everything or nothing. Still its genius and office are entirely misapprehended, if we suppose it requires us to desert our post in society ; if we fancy it expects us, or calls upon us, to withdraw from the world, and give ourselves wholly up to ascetic practices and devout contemplation. No such thing. Religion is the sovereign rule of life ; its spirit should pervade and transfigure the whole of life, even its humblest offices ; but it was never intended to be a life by itself, or something patched upon life. If you ask, Who is the best Christian ? I answer : Not he who makes the loudest professions of Christianity, nor he who gives the most time to thinking about it, nor yet he who best understands its principles ; but he who best succeeds in applying these principles to his daily cares and duties, and in filling his place in society, whatever it may be, in a Christ-like spirit.

Again, the injunction in the text is directed generally, and in principle, against the kindred error of supposing, that there are many lawful callings or professions, in which it is impossible to lead a Christian life. More difficult it may be, but not impossible, the difficulty only enhancing the virtue which has strength and resolution enough to overcome it. The military profession, a life in camps, is not likely to be recommended as particularly favorable to moral and religious culture ; yet this profession has contributed not a few illustrious examples, not only of patriotism, but also of integrity and honor, and even of reverence for religion, and of a Christian detestation of war, except as a dire necessity of nations. On the other hand, the clerical profession, to those who are fit for it, is generally thought, in a moral and religious point of view, to promise best of all; because the special business and object of the calling coincide so entirely with what ought to be the highest business and object of us all. But here also there is difficulty and drawback, showing that the difference in the eligibility of the various professions on moral grounds is not so great as is often supposed. Where the profession is religious, the danger is that the religion will become professional. Undoubtedly it is our duty to feel and express devout emotions; but the trouble with the clergyman is, that he is sometimes called upon to express devout emotions whether he feels them or not. Hence his danger of allowing his very earnestness to become mechanical; of sacrificing the life and freshness, and sometimes even the entire sincerity, of his religious experiences to professional repetition and routine. Then, too, looking merely at the effect of his labors, I believe it is often possible for a layman to do more for religion than a clergyman, from the very fact that he cannot be suspected of a professional bias or bribe.

We arrive, then, at the conclusion that all the great professions are open to choice, and that there is nothing in any one of them, in itself considered, to hinder a good man in certain cases from choosing it. But it by no means follows that all professions are equally eligible in themselves; much less, that all are equally eligible to every person, and under all circumstances. All are open to choice; but this does not exclude occasion for choice, or necessity for choice, or the duty of making a wise choice, as being that on which, more perhaps than on any other one thing, a man's usefulness and happiness will depend. Every day is adding to the importance of this step, by multiplying the number of the professions; by making it more and more indispensable that each individual should confine himself to a single profession; and also on account of the essential changes which some of the professions have undergone. For these reasons many of the old commonplaces no longer apply, making it necessary that every young man, on reaching the period when the choice can no longer be deferred, should give his own thoughts to the subject in view of the new demands of learning, society, and the times, as well as of his own capabilities and peculiar aptitudes.

which should influence and determine young men in the choice of a profession at the present day. A considerable portion of our society will not worship with us again: they have completed their general education, and must now make up their minds, if they have not made them up already, as to their special calling in life. Even in the case of those who have made up their minds definitively as to what they are to do, being determined perhaps for the most part by prudential considerations, or by personal preference, or by natural bias, it will still be well that the whole subject should be reconsidered under its moral and religious aspects.

Let me begin by observing, that if the time for choosing a profession has come, it is not well, as a general rule, to postpone it by unnecessary delays. If you say, your mind is unsettled; I reply, in the first place, that in practical matters the will has more to do in settling the mind than arguments; and, secondly, that the probable effect of another year spent without an object will only be to unsettle your minds still more. Perhaps, however, you are bent on devoting a year or two to general reading, or foreign travel, as a means of enlarging and expanding your minds. This sounds well; but, in point of fact, general reading and foreign travel, under such circumstances, are much more likely to dissipate the mind than to enlarge or expand it.

Indeed, what considerable advantage can there be, and I may even add, what practical interest, in reading or travelling without any particular object in view, without any reason why we should consider one thing rather than another, without being able to turn anything to immediate account by seeing how it bears on our own special pursuits? But you may have another motive for the delay: you may think to avoid in this way the error, so common in this country, of hurrying into active life without due preparation. To enter on the practice of any profession without being duly prepared for it is, I admit, a great error; but this is a reason for beginning the preparation as soon as may be; certainly it is no reason for unnecessary delays. So much impressed was Dr. Johnson with the mischiefs of hesitancy and fickleness on this subject, that he is half inclined to recommend that every one's calling should be determined by his parents or guardian; at any rate, he does not hesitate to conclude, "that of two states of life equally consistent with religion and virtue, he who chooses earliest chooses best."

Another preliminary suggestion is, that in choosing a profession we should take care not to allow too much weight to local and temporary considerations; — considerations which will have no bearing on our future progress, except perhaps to narrow and limit

it. I suppose there are those who can give no better reason for being in one profession rather than another than this; that they found it easier to get into it. But certainly our success and happiness are to depend, not on our getting into a profession, but on our getting on in it; that is to say, on our being able to fill it honorably and well. I know the common excuse. It will be said, that we are often placed in circumstances where we must do, not as we would, but as we can. And this is true. But certainly, as regards so important and eventful a step as the choice of a profession, it is seldom necessary for a young man in this country, with health and strength in his limbs, and courage in his heart, and nobody dependent on him, to resort to such an excuse for not resolving to find his proper place, cost what it may. We talk about what we can do, and what we cannot; but, after all, this is, for the most part, an arbitrary distinction. What one man calls impossible, another man calls merely difficult; and, with minds which are made of the right sort of stuff, difficulties do not repel or dishearten; they only stimulate to new and greater efforts. Do you still object, "But we must live meanwhile"? I reply, in the first place, that this does not necessarily follow: there are many things which we had better die rather than do or suffer. And besides, suppose we must live, we can live on bread and water; as a multitude of poor scholars have done for years, and afterwards won for themselves a brilliant success, an imperishable renown. Better, a thousand times better, live on bread and water for a few days, or a few months, than sacrifice the prospects of a whole life.

Hence we conclude, that every young man owes it to himself, at any cost or sacrifice consistent with virtue and religion, to find, as soon as may be, his proper place and calling, meaning thereby the place and calling in which, with his education and abilities, he is most likely to become useful and happy.

But how is he to find it? that is the great question. I answer generally, By considering what he was made for, taking into view, at the same time, his intellectual aptitudes, and his moral needs and dangers.

As regards intellectual or mental aptitudes, or what is sometimes called the natural bent of one's genius, two extreme opinions have found supporters, which seem to me to be almost equally removed from practical wisdom. The first is that of those who contend that a strong tendency to one profession rather than to another is to be considered; but only, that it may be crossed and overruled. They argue thus: Our highest object should be, not professional success and eminence, but human perfection, which supposes and requires balance and harmony of character. Now when any one betrays a strong proclivity to a particular profession, it shows that some parts of his mind are unduly, or at least disproportionately developed, while others are kept back; and, therefore, in choosing a profession, his object should be to find one which will tend to bring out the latter, so that he may become a complete and perfect man. Thus, if a person early manifests extraordinary talents for business and affairs, this is a reason why he should not be, by profession, a man of business and affairs, for he is enough of that already: he ought rather to go into the army or the Church, which will have the effect to call forth his latent qualities.

I hardly need say that this doctrine, plausible as it may seem to some minds, is theoretically false, and practically absurd. It is theoretically false; for, though balance and harmony of character enter into the theory of what a man ought to be, these have nothing to do with an equal, or even with a proportionate development of his faculties. His occupations may be wholly mechanical, for example; but it does not follow that his character will be either one-sided, or in any manner distorted. And besides, a man is not the whole of humanity; neither does he represent the whole of humanity; neither is he called upon, even in theory, to embody or personate the whole of this humanity, in all its ideal completeness and proportions. We are the many members which go to make up the one body; and it is enough if each member does its appropriate work, and does it well.

Moreover, to pursue the course recommended above would be practically absurd. Every man would do what he is least fitted to do; and the consequence would be, that the whole work of life would be done in the worst possible manner and under the greatest possible disadvantages.

Nor is this all; for the subject has its religious aspects. When we refer to a man's profession as being his vocation, or calling, we suppose him to be called. There is one profession, indeed, that of the divine, which it is generally, and, as I conceive, justly, thought to be presumptuous to enter without being distinctly and emphatically called, and called of God. But how called? The fancies and dreams of the enthusiast have nothing to do with a sober and practical matter of this kind. Every man is calmly and impartially to consider what he was made for, what by the constitution of his mind and character he is best fitted to become, and to look upon this as a call from God,—the voice of God speaking in his own nature, which, when distinct and emphatic, he has no right to disregard.

Often, however, and I suppose I may say, generally, the call is not distinct and emphatic, at least as regards most professions; and this leads me to notice the other of the two extreme opinions referred to above. It consists in supposing that every man has his place, and that everything depends on his finding that particular place, a mistake here being final and fatal. No such thing. We are not born with adaptations, but with adaptabilities; and these are such in most men that they can fit themselves as well, or nearly as well, for one as another of several professions. Leaving out of view eminence in the fine arts, which seems to require at the start a peculiar nervous organization, I do not believe there is one man in ten whom nature has endowed with aptitudes and predispositions so special and marked that he might not succeed perfectly well in any one out of several pursuits. In a large majority of cases the battle of life is won, not by natural, but by personal qualities; by those personal qualities which invite favor and inspire confidence and insure courage and persistency in whatever is undertaken. If any of you are perplexed and in trouble, not knowing what you were made for, this very doubt shows that, probably, you were not made for anything in particular. But what follows? Merely that your success in life will depend much less on mental aptitudes, or what is called bent of genius, than on what lies behind all this, — on strength of will, power of self-control, force of character. These will do more and better for you than incline you to a particular profession: they will make it as certain as anything human can be, that you will prosper, whatever may be your profession.

an aftergrowth ; that is to say, not only acquired, but acquired after the profession is adopted and entered upon. The childish preference and longing for a particular profession, sometimes awakened in the young in consequence of hearing it continually talked about, or of hearing themselves continually designated for it, really signifies nothing, and generally ends in nothing. To play with a pursuit, to amuse one's self with it in the spirit of an amateur, is no evidence of a radical and effective bent of mind : a man must be ready for the hard work necessary to distinction in it, or that distinction is not for him.

A proper taste for a particular profession, or interest in it, depends, for the most part, on the direction which curiosity takes, or rather on the path into which it is turned. Now this curiosity, especially when it becomes earnest and intense, is not born, as some would seem to imagine, of ignorance, but of knowledge. Idiots and savages who know comparatively nothing, are also found to be equally deficient in a desire to know. It is because we know so much already, that we pine and yearn to know more : the problems we have raised haunt us, and give us no rest until they are solved. Thus it is, that in proportion as the great questions and uses of a noble profession break on the mind, the mind, if it is of the right sort, is seized with a passion to master them, and make them its own. And this love of one's profession, which is generated by the profession itself, is much more to be relied on than any antecedent and supposed natural leaning; for the latter makes us love a profession before we can be said to know what it is, and therefore may often turn out to be a love of what we fancy the profession to be, but not of what it is in reality, or, at any rate, a love of some things about a profession, but not of the profession itself.

Nay, more. The most genuine and thorough devotion to one's chosen work is sometimes not merely an after, but also a slow growth, beginning even in positive dislike. "I have heard it observed," says a writer of excellent judgment, "that those men who have risen to the greatest eminence in the profession of law have been in general such as had at first an aversion to the study. The reason probably is, that to a mind fond of general principles every study must be at first disgusting which presents to it a chaos of facts apparently unconnected with each other. . . . A man destitute of genius may, with little effort, treasure up in his memory a number of particulars which he refers to no principle, and from which he deduces no conclusion; and from his facility in acquiring this stock of information, may flatter himself with the belief that he possesses a natural taste for this or that branch of knowledge. But they who are really destined to extend the boundaries of science, when they first enter on new pursuits, feel their attention distracted, and their memory overloaded with facts among which they can trace no relation, and are sometimes apt to despair entirely of their future progress."* In due time, however, their superiority appears, and arises in part from that very dissatisfaction which they at first experienced, as it will not cease to stimulate their inquiries until they penetrate to the foundations; until, underneath this confused mass of facts, they can discern those great laws of order and harmony which give meaning and unity to the whole, and which have such power to charm and hold the best minds.

I have dwelt longer than I intended on the regard which is to be paid to bent of genius and natural taste in the choice of a profession. Where these are distinctly pronounced they are generally decisive, and ought to be so: it would be folly, I had almost said impiety, to disregard them. On the other hand, where, as in a vast majority of cases, they are not distinctly pronounced, this is no ground of apprehension that a wrong choice will be made, for a wrong choice, under such circumstances, is hardly possible: the very occasion of the hesitancy as to what ought to be done is the fact that several things can be done almost equally well. Neither is it ground of discouragement as to final success. Any of the great professions, if entered into with an honest and earnest purpose, and faithfully followed up, will soon generate, if it does not find, the spirit and mental aptitude it requires: so that every one may begin life with a reasonable assurance that his progress will be in proportion to his general ability, provided only that he is true to his calling, whatever it may be, and true to himself.

But, as intimated before, there is another consideration which every one should take into view in the choice of a profession: I mean, his moral needs and dangers.

Complaints, frequent and deep, come up from all quarters, that moral and religious education is more and more neglected; that young men are trained in letters and science, but not in Christianity, and then are sent forth into the world, to do as they may. These complaints are doubtless, to a certain extent, well founded; but there is no occasion for exaggerating existing evils, no wisdom in turning a sermon into a lampoon on the country or the age. After all, the best part of a Christian education does not result from the formal teaching of a catechism, or the formal observance of an outward ritual, but from participation in the life of a community acting, consciously or unconsciously, under the influence of Christian ideas. And in this respect I do not believe in the degeneracy of modern times. The thousand reformatory movements going on around us, although attended with not a little of folly and extravagance, prove incontestably one thing: they prove that men are beginning to feel, as they never did before, that religion is not merely to be professed, but lived; that it is to mould, not merely the faith and worship of individuals, but the manners and customs of society, the institutions and the laws; in short, that a community is Christian so far as it acts out Christian ideas, and no further. Now I say, that merely to grow up in such a community, and, as a necessary consequence, to partake more or less of the prevailing spirit, is a sort of Christian education, and, with all its drawbacks and shortcomings, a better Christian education, in my opinion, than was ever given in the conventual schools of the Middle Ages, where theology, and the means and forms of a mechanical devotion, were almost the only things taught.

Growing up amidst these movements, and partaking more or less of the common life, it is hardly to be expected that young men, in deliberately laying down a plan of life, will make it part of that plan to purchase success by the sacrifice of integrity and honor. But the danger is, that they will not take care, in the outset, effectually to guard against the possibility of such an event, though it does not enter into their plan. The danger is, that they will allow themselves to be drawn into connections, and under influences, which will slowly and unconsciously undermine their integrity and honor; that in selecting their worldly pursuits they will think only of worldly ends, not reflecting, that, without personal dignity and worth, distinction is an empty name, and wealth but a temptation, or at best a vulgar care.

It will not do to rank the choice of a profession among things indifferent, or things allowable, in a moral point of view, on the ground that there is no morality whatever in preferring the study of medicine to that of law, or the study of law to that of medicine. True, there is no morality in preferring one study to another, nor in the act of choice founded on that preference, simply considered; nevertheless, the consequences of the act may be of unspeakable moment in their bearing on a man's moral progress, as it determines the sphere and kind of his actions, and it is in the doing of these actions that his character will be formed. Again, it will not do to assume that it must be safe to adopt this or that profession, on the ground that good men have done so, without ceasing to be good men. The safety of such men may be owing to conditions in which they differ from you;—to a different temperament, to a different previous training, or perhaps to their very goodness itself, leading them to take a higher and more Christian view of the nature and ends of the profession, and of their duties to it. We know from Scripture that some can tread on serpents and scorpions without being hurt; but it is not so with all.

And besides, it is not enough to know that your profession will not hurt you: it should help you; it is to make you, for the most part, what you are to be. Much, I am aware, is said, at the present day, about extra-professional duties and activities, and many appear to look in that direction for their principal influence and distinction. In order to vindicate this course by a show of reasoning, they will tell you that a clergyman, for example, is more a citizen than he is a clergyman, and more a man than he is a citizen. Indeed! on this principle they might go one step further, and say that he is more an animal than either. The argument is fallacious at bottom; if it proved anything, it would prove too much. The mistake originates in overlooking or misapplying the logical paradox, that the less extensive a general term is, the more it includes. The clergyman is a man and a citizen, and something more. Speaking generally, the office indicates and defines the sphere in which the duties of the man and the citizen are to be fulfilled. In one word, he has an appropriate and specific care which he has no right to forsake, that he may look after another man's. See how such conduct would strike you in other and simpler relations. The helm is put into the pilot's hands, which he neglects that he may talk politics with the crew,—on the plea, forsooth, that he is more a citizen than a pilot,—and the vessel is lost. Would the owners be satisfied? Would anybody be satisfied? I think not. Among the ultrasims with which the age teems, there is none for which less can be said than for that unnatural and impracticable cosmopolitanism which makes our responsibilities begin with the duties farthest from us, and is chiefly anxious lest we should love our friends, our country, our profession, too well. Let not the cant of a so-called liberalism make you ashamed of a hearty devotion to your profession, after you have chosen it, seeking by your success in that, and not in digressions from it, to build up an honest independence and a good name. But for this very reason it becomes the more necessary that your profession should be one which will afford scope for your best affections and abilities, and tend to make the most, not only of your circumstances, but of yourselves.

Hence it may be thought that I have done nothing, after all, to lessen the embarrassment attendant on the choice of a profession, but only changed its issues, making it to turn on the question of moral fitness, and not, as a general rule, on that of mental aptitude, or bent of genius. This, however, is only partially true. The moral embarrassments almost entirely disappear, as soon as the subject is approached with an honest purpose to do what is right. In such a frame of mind it is hardly possible that a thought should be entertained of a pursuit involving great moral dangers or incongruities. A man's profession is no longer regarded as a field of selfish competition, but of a noble and generous emulation in the public service, the only, or the main solicitude being, that he may find a situation in which he can best fulfil all his duties to God and man. And even this solicitude need not trouble the upright in heart; for moral safety and moral progress seldom require that a man should change his profession, but only that he should take a different and a higher view of what belongs to the profession he has chosen. A profession, which to low and sordid men is as low and sordid as they, becomes transfigured in the new lights and relations under which it is regarded by the enlightened and devoted Christian. Meanwhile the lawyer does not cease to be a lawyer, merely because he becomes a Christian lawyer; neither does the physician cease to be a physician, merely because he becomes a Christian physician.

I have now set before you, my friends, what seems to me to be the duty of a young man in the choice of his profession, and I have endeavored to do it in such a manner, that no one may think to find in his perplexity as to what he ought to do an excuse for doing nothing. Neither your profession nor your circumstances, but the quick eye, and the strong arm, and the iron will must work out for you the great problem of life. These qualities, however, are little better than brute force, unless inspired and directed by a high moral purpose; and this high moral purpose little better than a breath of air, unless it rests on religious faith; and this religious faith "unstable as water," unless accepted as the revealed will of God. "For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid, which is Jesus Christ."

THE END NOT YET.

NOT AS THOUGH I HAD ALREADY ATTAINED, EITHER WERE ALREADY PERFECT : BUT I FOLLOW AFTER.—Philippians iii. 12.

ONE of the strongest natural proofs or presumptions of man's immortality is found in the fact, that his entire destiny never seems to be accomplished in this life. He never becomes, in the present constitution of things, all that his nature, in itself considered, makes him capable of becoming. It is not so with the inferior animals. All mere animals, without a single exception, have their instincts with fixed boundaries, which are soon reached and never passed, and never would be passed if they were to live forever. But no such boundaries are set to the human faculties. Every new acquisition which a man makes is not only so much gained, but a new power of gaining more; and so on, without end. Now, why endow him with a nature capable of unlimited growth and progress, why introduce this into the plan of creation, and yet not provide scope in the same plan for the actual or possible development of such a nature? Can we believe that man, alone of all beings, should be clothed with a nature which is in contradiction to his destiny? that he is constituted and contrived for one issue, and doomed to another? that he, alone of all beings, is mocked with conscious powers and irrepressible aspirations, which were intended from the beginning to be disappointed? in fine, that the sentiments which most ennoble him, and the faith which most inspires and exalts him, should all have their foundation and root in a delusion and a lie?

No; though man can never attain to perfection, he will always be in a condition, if so disposed, to make continual advances towards it. And hence the distinguishing peculiarity of human life, that it is never finished, never completed, in the sense of all being done that ought to be done. Man's goal in the distance is not a stationary one; it is continually moving on before him: and this is provided for, in the mind of man, as well as in his circumstances, by making his powers of conception to transcend his powers of execution. By the very process of transmuting the ideal of yesterday into the actual of to-day, he is put into a condition to elevate and purify his former ideal; his notion or conception of what he ought to be is still in advance of what he is. His rule should be, always to do his best; but his best of to-day is a better best than that of yesterday, because his views have been enlarged and extended.

Hence it is, that, with every man in whom there is the slightest pretension to activity of thought, the ideal of life always keeps in advance of the actual, to beckon him on. Constituted as his nature is, there never will come a time, in this world or the next, when he will not have occasion to say, with the Apostle, "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after." The end is not yet.

From this constitution of human life two consequences flow; both of which will strike us at first sight as evil, but on further consideration will be approved as good.

In the first place, a foundation is thus laid in the human soul for a profound and ineradicable feeling of discontent and unrest. I do not here use the term "discontent" in the sense in which it is most frequently taken; I do not mean discontent with the past, or discontent with our condition and circumstances; but merely discontent with ourselves as we are, grounded on a conviction that we might be, and ought to be, continually growing better. If it should be objected, that all discontent supposes uneasiness, and all uneasiness pain, and that all pain is evil, I answer that this is reasoning according to sound, and not according to sense. All uneasiness does not suppose positive pain. That uneasiness with our present selves which puts us on self-improvement is not attended with pain, provided only that nothing exists within or without to hinder such self-improvement. It is nothing but the uneasiness of desire; and who would live with nothing to desire? It is not necessarily accompanied by a shade of remorse, or repentance, or even of regret; for the self-improvement desired may not be from bad to good, but from good to better; and this is a longing which may burn in the heart of an archangel, as well as in that of halting and fainting man. What, however, under this view, becomes of the peace and rest which the Gospel promises as the reward of faith and obedience? "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me; for I am meek and lowly of heart; and ye shall find rest to your souls." I answer, again, that the "rest" here spoken of is rest from worldly uneasiness and discontent, rest from struggle and conflict with external or internal foes,—not rest from progress, not rest from self-improvement.

There is also, as I have intimated above, another consequence, and one of still greater practical moment, flowing from the fact, that the end of human life is not an attainment made once for all, but a continual unfolding, a continual advancing. This consequence is, that, as human life is never complete, education, which is the preparation for it in its different and successive degrees and stages, is never complete. You remember those noble words of Milton:

“I call, therefore, a complete and generous education that which fits a man to perform justly, skilfully, and magnanimously all the offices, both private and public, of peace and war.”* But when, in the very next sentence, he proceeds to call attention to the manner in which “all this may be done between twelve and one and twenty,” we feel that he has lost sight of his own conception of what education should be, and sunk down to the common and low view of the subject. Education, in its highest and best sense, does not consist wholly or mainly in mere teaching, but still more in the unfolding and training of the intellectual and moral faculties. It comprehends the sum total of the preparation for the life to follow; and, understood in this sense, it is obvious that no bounds are set to it, or can be set to it. Childhood is the education for youth; youth, for manhood; manhood, for old age; and the whole of this life for the life to come. Neither will it stop there. Hints abound in Scripture which confirm the expectation, founded on the analogies of nature, that progress will not end with the world that now is. The immortal spirit will still need to be fitted for higher and higher stages in the heavenly society and the heavenly occupations and enjoyments. Education will never stand still; its work will never be accomplished; the time will never come when it cannot be said, with as much truth as now, "The end is not yet." The great Apostle to the Gentiles is probably repeating now, what he said or implied so often on earth, "Not as though I had already attained, either were already perfect: but I follow after."

This train of thought has been suggested by the condition and prospects of that portion of my audience who have just accomplished their collegiate course, and are worshipping with us for the last time.

To say, my young friends, that your education is not as yet complete, would be to say what you all feel and know. Many of you have already made arrangements to enter immediately on professional or more exclusively scientific studies, understanding it to be in continuation of the education which you have begun here. Under these circumstances it is of importance to apprehend as clearly as may be the precise place which an academic training holds in the life of a liberally educated man.

In the first place, there is the exercise and discipline of the intellectual faculties. Bishop Butler has told you, that "if we suppose a person brought into the world with all his powers of body and mind in maturity, as far as this is conceivable, he would plainly be at first as unqualified for the human life of mature age as an idiot."* And the reason is obvious. It is not enough that we have powers; we must know how to use them, have them under our command, be able to concentrate them on this subject or that, as we choose; which is the work of experience and discipline. Now I admit that any mode of life supposes some kind and some degree of experience and intellectual activity; and this is of the nature of education, and leads to more or less of self-culture. All life is exercise, and all exercise is education of some sort or other; but a collegiate education has this distinction and privilege: it is systematic education,—education systematically contrived with a view to bring out and cultivate in the best manner all the faculties, neither neglecting any nor exaggerating any. Provided it does this effectively, it accomplishes, as far as it goes, the great purpose of a general and preparatory education.

Here, then, is a sufficient answer to the shallow but popular objection, that many things studied in colleges have no direct bearing on after life. This is often doubtless the case with some particular studies, in themselves considered, but not with the general discipline they induce, which is the principal thing. It cannot be repeated too often, that the principal object aimed at in preliminary and general education is, not to teach one what he ought to think in after life, but to put him into a condition to think for himself, with judgment, discrimination, energy, and taste. For this reason the wisdom of ages has pronounced in favor of classical studies, as laying the best foundation of a liberal culture; no matter though the student should never have occasion in after life to open a Latin or Greek book, or, indeed, attain to such proficiency as would enable him to enjoy it, if he did. The same may also be said of the study of mathematics and metaphysics, at least in respect to minds having any natural aptitude for it. A great master of the last-mentioned science has said: "It is as the best gymnastic of the mind,—as a mean, principally, and almost exclusively conducive to the highest education of our noblest powers, that we would vindicate to these speculations the necessity which has too frequently been denied them. By no other intellectual application (and least of all by physical pursuits) is the soul thus reflected on itself, and its faculties concentrated in such independent, vigorous, unwonted, and continued energy;—by none, therefore, are its best capacities so variously and intensely evolved. 'Where there is most life, there is the victory.' " *

Even, therefore, if all that is learned in colleges in the way of positive instruction were forgotten at the moment of leaving them, it does not follow that the time spent there is misspent. But all is not forgotten.

Accordingly I would mention, as the second advantage of a college course, the general information it imparts in almost every field of human inquiry; which general information, considered as the basis of a special scientific or professional education, makes the whole to be a truly liberal education. Who does not know that what are called the learned professions may be adopted and followed in a spirit as narrow and sordid as any of the handicrafts? This is the case, for the most part, with the lawyer who is nothing but a lawyer, and with the physician who is nothing but a physician; neither being bent on understanding his profession in its highest relations, or exalting it to its highest uses, but only on turning it to immediate profit. Some have thought that this might be prevented by resisting the tendency of modern times to a division and subdivision of intellectual labor. But not so. This tendency to a division and subdivision of intellectual labor is a necessary consequence of the advancement of the arts and sciences, making it indispensable to success, certainly to eminence, that a man should give himself mainly to a single department. Under these circumstances, if a professional man does not start with a mind stored with the fruits of good learning, or at least with an acquired taste for such things, it is hardly to be expected that he will ever have them. A lawyer or physician in full practice can find opportunity for liberal studies and a general self-culture, if he is so disposed ; but the disposition itself is not likely to spring up amidst the fatigues and distractions of his daily and hourly cares. If you mean by a lawyer nothing more than a cunning and successful trier of cases, one who can browbeat a witness or mystify the jury, I do not suppose that a college education is necessary to such a person, or even that it would be useful. But if you mean by a lawyer, an accomplished advocate, one who can seize the principle which lies concealed under the precedent, and make the darkest subject plain to common minds, by throwing upon it the lights of an extended and various erudition, it is certain that mere legal culture will not do. It must be legal culture, founded on the highest general and learned culture which the age affords.

The third principal benefit resulting from a college training, considered as preliminary to the more special vocations in life, is not so much intellectual as moral and practical. A college, as we have been told again and again, is a little world, a microcosm, where almost every faculty, disposition, and passion is put to the proof which is ever called out in the great world. Here the student must exer-

aise self-control, especially as regards the love of ease and the love of pleasure, or take the consequences. Here he must choose his amusements and his companions wisely, or take the consequences. Here also he must concentrate his attention on the work of the hour, and submit to earnest and continuous labor, or take the consequences. And these consequences, though not always the same in form, are the same in substance, and, as far as they go, the same in their bearing on success and happiness as in the great world. All this, however, may be said to hold true of early life, wherever passed; and so it does. What distinguishes a college life is, that it comes to a natural close; judgment is pronounced upon it; we say of one person, he has succeeded, and of another, he has failed. The same actors will reappear, indeed; but it will be on another stage, in other connections, and with other objects in view; hence it will not follow necessarily, because a man has failed here, that he will fail there. He may be said to have a second trial, while others, with a continuous, unbroken life, have but one.

Now I look on this as an obvious and great advantage. It is not uncommon for persons when near the close of their earthly existence to express a wish that they could live this life over again. With their present experience they are not unwilling to admit that they should do differently in many respects; that they should set a different estimate on many of the pursuits of ambition and pleasure, and know how to shun many a hidden pitfall. This cannot be; but a privilege resembling it to a certain extent is enjoyed by all those who, after having completed their college course, can carry the often dear-bought wisdom which they have gained there into new scenes. Thus college life is not merely a preparation for the life to follow,—a quality which it possesses in common with every form of novitiate or apprenticeship,—but also a life by itself, a rehearsal, so to speak, of the life to follow, a sort of trial-life, with its retributions carried out, leaving those who have just passed through it to enter upon another career with the singular benefit of such an experience.

This, my friends, is precisely your condition at this moment. With one foot on the threshold of the great world, you cannot help looking back; and you cannot help looking forward.

You cannot help looking back. And what do you see? Many things, I hope, which you can review with satisfaction. But are there not also many things which you now wish had not been? No writer has sufficiently explained that law of our nature by which an excited state of the passions is able to pervert our judgment as to what is right and safe. Explain it, however, as we may, one thing is certain ; in the moment of action, with our desires raised and inflamed, we are seldom in a condition to form a just opinion of the true character and real tendency of what we do. Afterwards comes a season of sober reflection, when we can see things as they are ; when we can pronounce as impartially on our own conduct as on that of others ; when we can feel that we have been made fools of by sophistries which will not bear a moment's examination ; that we have sought to reconcile ourselves to ourselves by excuses which we suspected at the time, and which we now know, were hollow and vain. This is generally the crisis in a young man's destiny. If he is of a dull or reckless mind, he will refuse to dwell on the subject, and go on as before. If he is of a sensitive and weak mind, he will be apt to indulge in unavailing regrets, and perhaps give up all as lost. But if he is of a sound and resolute mind, he will make his past mistakes and failures to be his teachers ; the consciousness of his very sins will stir his moral nature to its depths, and sometimes have the effect to rouse him to a new activity. Thus students of good natural dispositions and gifts, who have spent their time in college to but little purpose, not unfrequently wake up at the close of it, and give themselves to their subsequent pursuits with an earnestness and devotion which redeem the evil days and surprise

all. In this way they may be said, more perhaps than any other class of persons, to have a second chance to distinguish themselves, a second chance to satisfy their friends and put themselves right before the world and before God ; but it is commonly their last chance.

Again, you cannot help looking forward. And what do you see? You see, in the first place, that success is to depend, much more than it has done hitherto, on yourselves. Up to this hour fond and anxious eyes have watched over you ; your wants have been anticipated, and provided for, day by day ; other hands have assisted yours in removing the obstacles in your path ; you have pursued your studies under a routine, which, however irksome to you in other respects, has had this effect at least : it has helped to supply the defects in your own self-direction and self-control. But all this is now over. In the pursuit of your professional studies the restraints of discipline will no longer be felt. The momentous, the terrible gift of freedom is put into your hands, and you will be left to make yourselves as wise and virtuous and happy as you please, or as foolish and vicious and miserable as you please. This, more perhaps than anything else, must have the effect to induce you to pause, and ponder your steps. But the doctrine is one which has its bright as well as its dark side. Many young men are troubled by the apprehension that their success in life will depend on their choosing the right profession, or on finding their proper place in society. But no such thing. If your tastes and aptitudes are strongly marked, you can hardly help choosing the right profession, and falling into the proper place ; and if your tastes and aptitudes are not strongly marked, it is plain that you would do about as well in one profession or place as in another. In any event, success will not depend on profession or place ; it will depend on yourselves. Under God it will depend on yourselves whether you become something or nothing ; and even the help you are to expect from God is to come through your own choice and your own exertions. “ Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling ; for it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure.”

Again ; you see, you can hardly help seeing, that in the life before you everything will depend, in the last resort, on moral worth sustained by Christian faith. In early life we have to content ourselves with good dispositions and generous impulses, for these have not had time to take the form of habit. But good dispositions and generous impulses are motives merely ; they do not constitute a solid foundation of character, on which alone a truly happy and prosperous life can be built. I do not deny that knowledge, talent, genius, may procure a certain measure of renown, a certain sort of power; but there is one thing which is absolutely indispensable to a happy and prosperous life, and which they never did and never can procure; I mean, public confidence. This depends on moral worth; and moral worth must find its support in religious principle; and the religious principle must be, in your case, enlightened religious principle. A merely practical man may accept the religion which prevails around him, and in such unthinking acquiescence find all the support he needs. But the scholar, whose business it is to inquire and investigate, must see with his own eyes; he must see that the religion he professes is consistent with itself and with all known truth, otherwise it will not be likely to do much to give either stability to his character or peace to his soul.

Remember, you have but begun your education, an education which is never to come to an end; but you have begun it well, if you have laid the foundation of a broad and generous culture of the whole mind. Hereafter you are to pursue a narrower walk; but let not your eagerness for professional advancement narrow your thoughts or your affections, or lead you to neglect what is necessary to moral and religious progress. "For what shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" As professional men, as scholars, as Christians, let me beseech you to take up the noble declaration of the Apostle, "I count not myself to have apprehended: but this one thing I do; forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

FAITH AND WORKS.

YE SEE THEN HOW THAT BY WORKS A MAN IS JUSTIFIED, AND NOT BY FAITH ONLY.—James ii. 24.

LUTHER, unable to reconcile this and other passages in the Epistle of James with his favorite doctrine of justification by faith alone, did not hesitate to stigmatize the whole as “an epistle of straw.” Others, also, have presumed to speak in terms almost equally disparaging and contemptuous of this Apostle, not only on account of the supposed contradiction between him and Paul respecting justification, but also because the name of Christ is scarcely mentioned by him above once or twice, and then coldly; and because he is silent respecting the mysteries of the incarnation and redemption, morality being the principal theme. .

But this is not the way, as it seems to me, in which to show our respect for the Scriptures. Instead of setting up one writer above another, one book above another, or one passage above another, it certainly would be more becoming to inquire whether some

Take, for example, this long-contested question respecting Faith and Works. Some, relying on one set of texts, maintain that mankind are justified and saved by faith "without works;" others, relying on another set of texts, maintain that "faith without works is dead." How are these apparently contradictory doctrines to be reconciled?

It seems to me that the origin and continuance of this controversy in the Church, as well as of many others, are mainly, if not entirely, owing to the imperfection and ambiguity of language. When we are said to be saved by faith alone, faith is understood to include all that is essential to obedience in a moral point of view; that is to say, a disposition and purpose to obey, an effective principle of obedience, an inward act of self-surrender and trust. On the other hand, when we are said to be saved by works, works are understood to include the internal as well as the external part of the virtuous act; not merely the outward form of obedience, but also its spring and soul; that is to say, the conviction, the faith, which the works express, and which must really exist or the works are a vain show.

Accordingly, both the doctrines, when rightly understood, agree in making obedience, "righteousness and true holiness," to be the ultimate ground of salvation ; the only difference being, that one regards this obedience in the inward principle from which it starts, and the other in the outward act in which it is consummated. Thus, if we cannot say that these two doctrines are one and identical, we can say, nevertheless, that they do but represent different sides of one and the same truth, and indeed that each supposes or involves the other. The only faith which saves, is the faith which leads to good works, as occasion offers ; and the only works which save, are the works which spring from faith, — from faith in some moral or religious principle, as their living root in the soul ; and the only reason why either of them saves is, that both alike denote a life brought inwardly and outwardly into harmony with the Divine Will.

Let us now inquire whether this view of faith and works, and their connection with salvation, is not confirmed by Scripture, and whether it does not afford the means of reconciling what have been thought the discordant teachings of the two Apostles on this subject.

We begin with an example from the Old Testament, often cited in this discussion. “ Abraham,” it is said, “ believed God, and it was counted unto him for righteousness.” Now it will not be pretended that the faith here spoken of was a mere assenting to propositions, or the holding of a creed, or an intellectual act of any kind. It was not a speculative, but a practical faith. The patriarch "believed God;" that is to say, confided in him, was willing to be led by him, was ready to do whatever God required. It was not a mere conviction, but a disposition; one which he evinced pre-eminently in the first recorded act of his life, when he went out from his own country, in implicit obedience to a Divine intimation, "not knowing whither he went"; and again, on a still more memorable occasion, when, in implicit obedience to a like intimation, he "stretched forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son." True, in the last-mentioned case his hand was stayed; but this made no moral difference, no difference in his disposition to obey, no difference in his deserts. No matter whether his faith was acted out or not; he was ready to act it out, being hindered by extraneous causes alone. The will was there, and the will was taken for the deed, as having all the moral character the deed itself could have, under any circumstances.

To be convinced that there was nothing unreasonable or strange in all this, it is only necessary to reverse the conditions of the case. Suppose that Abraham had made up his mind to disobey, but had been frustrated in the attempt by some unforeseen accident; every one would have said that, in the eye of conscience, he was guilty. If, then, a disposition to disobey would of itself have been counted unto him for unrighteousness, why wonder that faith, which stands in this connection for a disposition to obey, was counted unto him for righteousness? Above all, why appeal to such texts to prove that righteousness is unnecessary, when from these very texts it appears that it was only in so far as his faith "was counted unto him for righteousness" that it was of any avail?

Before considering more particularly the language used in the New Testament in speaking of faith as a condition of salvation, it will be proper to say a few words of the relation which the New Testament, taken as a whole, bears to the Old, in the education of the great human family.

A wise parent, in bringing up his children, accommodates his modes of training to their years; that is, to the degree of development which their moral and intellectual faculties have attained. He does not begin by inculcating general principles and dispositions, which his children are not as yet in a condition to comprehend, and then tell them to go and apply these principles and dispositions, as occasion offers, in the multiplied and complicated relations of human life. This would be to treat children as if they were men. He begins by commanding or forbidding easily intelligible actions. Why these particular actions are to be done or avoided it is not necessary that the child should know: it is enough if the parent knows that the habits thus formed are likely to generate the inward spirit required and unfold the character aright. And so with the Universal Father. Judaism was not a dispensation of inward principles, of moral and spiritual truth, for which the world was as yet unprepared, but a dispensation of outward routine, of specific regulations and ordinances. Even the morality inculcated by Moses was inculcated, for the most part, under the form of specific outward acts to be done or avoided, and not of inward principles or dispositions to be believed in, cherished, and carried out.

We do not mention this in order to find fault with it. We do not complain that an all-wise Providence has adapted his special modes of human training to the successive stages of human progress. Considered with reference to the age and people for which it was designed, Judaism was undoubtedly better fitted to accomplish its purpose, than if it had been conceived on the same plan with Christianity: we only say that it was not conceived on the same plan. Its ultimate object, indeed, was the same,—human progress; but it aimed to accomplish this object in another and, for the time, a better way. The Jews were to be carried forward in their moral and religious culture by the reflex influence on their minds and hearts of an imposing ritual, which meant much more than they were as yet in a condition to comprehend, if stated in the form of principles. Children in spiritual understanding, they were treated as children; that is, subjected to an outward discipline, which, whether they could enter at first into its profound spiritual import or not, was of such a nature that it could hardly fail, however blindly and mechanically gone through with, to react powerfully on their feelings and imagination, and so keep alive among them a sense of religion, and gradually form them to a capacity for a higher and more spiritual revelation.

Mark, then, the radical distinction between the Jewish peculiarity and the Christian peculiarity, — a distinction which holds as well in respect to the moral as the ceremonial law. The Jew was expected to conform his life and worship to certain externally imposed rules; the Christian is expected to accept and carry out certain internal principles. With the Jew, the reforming power of his religion acted from without inwardly; with the Christian, the reforming power of his religion acts from within outwardly. The great question with the Jew was, Have I done what is required? The great question with the Christian is, Are my moral convictions, my inward purposes and dispositions, my spirit and my trust, what they ought to be? In one word, the former was a dispensation of "works," the latter, a dispensation of "faith," but both, equally and alike, dispensations of obedience and of progress.

This being premised, it is easy to see why the New Testament lays so much stress on faith, often representing it as the one thing needful, the sole, indispensable condition of acceptance with God.

Sometimes it is stated thus: "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thine house." That is to say, "Put your trust in him; commit yourself wholly to his guidance; renounce all confidence in other teachers and leaders; and confide in him, and follow him." Obviously, therefore, faith in this case is not meant to exclude obedience, or to supersede its necessity: on the contrary, it involves or supposes obedience, or at least a disposition to obey in all things. To make this clear, take a parallel case. A man in attempting to traverse an unfrequented forest is bewildered and lost; he does not know which way to turn. You procure for him a trusty and experienced guide, and say: "Have faith in this guide; confide in him; do as he advises, and go as he directs; and you are safe." Here salvation is made to depend, you will observe, on faith, on faith in a guide; but, I repeat, so far is this from excluding obedience, or dispensing with its necessity, that it is understood by all to involve or suppose it, or to lead to it; so that without a purpose at least of obedience it cannot exist even as faith. What if the traveller should say, "I have entire faith in the guide;" but still should refuse or neglect to follow him? Would not all exclaim that this is not the faith which saves? Merely to believe that the guide is able and willing to lead you to a place of safety is nothing: you must actually follow him, or you will never reach that place of safety.

Again, not the person, but the teachings of our Lord, are sometimes made the objects of a saving faith. Thus we are told: "For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ; for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." That is to say, it is the power of God unto salvation to every one who confides in it; who gives himself up to it; who accepts its revelations as realities, and therefore is affected by them as realities; who takes the view which the Gospel gives of the spiritual life and the spiritual world into his inmost consciousness, and governs himself accordingly in his inmost purposes and thoughts. But faith in Christianity, thus understood, supposes something more than a mere conviction that the system is trustworthy: it supposes the practical exercise of this trust on our part, an act of self-surrender, giving ourselves up to it; just as a merchant is said to have faith in a ship when he embarks in it, or puts his property on board of it; or a sick man in a new method of cure, when he abandons all others, and trusts himself to that. The sick man, however, takes the medicine. Nobody expects to be healed merely by believing in the efficacy of a medicine, if he does not take it. For the same reason the impotent in virtue must not expect advantage from faith in the remedies which the Gospel proposes, if they do not also take these remedies; but to do this is to obey.

One word, now, on the apparent discrepancy between Paul and James on this subject. "Therefore we conclude," says the former, "that a man is justified by faith without the works of the law." By "works of the law" we are not to understand, in this place, what is commonly meant in discourses on practical religion by "good works," that is, the acting out of Christian principles, but a mere external conformity to a prescribed rule of conduct. The doctrine is, that under the Christian dispensation men are not justified and saved by a mere external conformity, however exact, to any externally imposed law, however righteous and good. "Works," overt actions, have no proper moral or religious worth, unless they have their root in faith and love. It is not enough that the hand obeys; the will, the heart, must also obey; and this supposes an act of self-surrender; and this, again, supposes faith. What a man is inwardly, that is, in himself, and not what he is outwardly (except as it is the evidence, the expression, the carrying out of what he is inwardly), has weight with God. The heart to obey, the spirit of obedience, that confidence and trust which begets a willingness to be led, and which is all comprehended under the single term faith, is the great thing. "Man looketh on the outward appearance," for it is by that only that he can judge his fellow-man; "but the Lord looketh on the heart," so that if the heart, the disposition, be right, even though no opportunity for manifesting it in outward action should occur, the disposition alone will be accepted. In one word, as in the case of Abraham before mentioned, the will is taken for the deed; the spirit of obedience for actual obedience; a meek and trustful self-surrender to Christian guidance, or faith alone, for the works to which it leads.

Nay, more; even when our faith is manifested by our works, we are not saved, according to the Gospel, by our outward works, but by the inward principle from which they spring, by our faith: so that here again we are saved, not by works, but by faith. Without faith in Christian principles a man may do many things which these principles sanction or require. Thus, he may give largely to the poor, or endow hospitals or colleges, which are certainly liberal acts, and yet be a stranger to the Christian principle of liberality; but you would hardly say, in such cases, that he acts out a Christian principle. You would hardly say that a man can act out a principle which he does not feel; or, again, that he can truly feel a principle in which he does not believe. Accordingly, the Gospel is conceived on the plan of inducing faith in a higher set of principles than that which the world acknowledges as the necessary condition and prerequisite of a higher form of character. Everything, therefore, has its root in this faith. While this faith is alive, all is alive; when this faith is dead, all is dead; and hence the whole dispensation is not inaptly denominated by the Apostle "the Law of Faith."

This is the doctrine of Paul. When rightly and clearly apprehended, it will be seen not to conflict with the prevailing opinion, that Christianity is almost wholly a practical thing, and that the Christian salvation depends on "righteousness and true holiness," on conformity of heart and will with the Divine law. But it is a doctrine, which, in certain states of the public mind, is peculiarly liable to perversion, and this perversion began to manifest itself in the Apostolic Age, calling forth the earnest exhortations of James in the chapter from which my text is taken. "Ye see, then, how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only." Here it is plain, from the examples adduced, that by "works" we are to understand really good works, by which I mean, the acting out of Christian principles ; and the object of the Apostle is to warn men against forsaking this ground of hope, and building on a merely speculative faith, or a dreamy, sentimental, sterile admiration of our Lord's character and words. Still, the only difference between the two Apostles is this : one regards obedience in the inward principle from which it starts, and the other in the outward act in which it is consummated ; — both, however, making obedience, “righteousness and true holiness,” the ultimate ground of salvation, the breath of eternal life.

Let me impress upon you the great practical lesson to be gathered from the twofold aspect of the Apostolic doctrine respecting faith and works. There are times when, on account of the hollowness and superficialness of the public morals, we ought to insist, with Paul, that works, apart from the living principle of faith in the soul, are vain ; and, again, there are times when, on account of the prevalent sentimentalism, mysticism, and morbid introversion of spirit, we ought to insist, with James, “that faith without works is dead.”

SALVATION BY HOPE.

FOR WE ARE SAVED BY HOPE.—Romans viii. 24.

THE Gospel, as the term denotes, is glad tidings; — glad tidings to all, not excepting the chiefest of sinners. No matter what may have been a man's past life, if he is now sincerely disposed to turn unto God, it holds out to him the promise of sympathy, pardon, and help. It is a Divine dispensation of encouragement. Its salvation is a salvation "by hope."

To understand this doctrine, it will be necessary to begin by considering generally what mankind stand most in need of as a motive and means to that change of heart and life on which salvation depends.

And, first, in case of hardened and abandoned sinners. With respect to such men, at least, I believe the impression is almost universal, that what they stand most in need of is, to be thoroughly alarmed. The preacher, it is said, must arouse them to a proper sense of their danger, by an honest dealing with the terrors of the law, by vivid pictures of the judgment to come if they die impenitent. Undoubtedly this is among the means which are appointed for reclaiming bad men ; but that it is the only means, or the means most likely to be effectual, or the means most needed, is not so clear. The usual argument for resorting to it, in preference to all others, is far from being satisfactory. This argument is, that as bad men, through the indurating effects of sin, have become insensible to higher and better motives, they must be moved, if moved at all, by a fear of God's indignation and wrath. But those who insist thus on the indurating effects of sin should remember that these effects are nowhere more apparent than in respect to the very motive in question. Sin hardens men, I admit, against a sense of duty and a sense of shame ; but it hardens them, if possible, still more against a sense of any dangers dependent on what religion threatens ; that is to say, against their spiritual dangers.

For this reason, I am not surprised to find that the two Christian sects which have distinguished themselves above all others for their successful dealing with hardened and abandoned sinners, I mean the Moravians and the Methodists, are remarkable for founding religion, not on selfish fear, or on calculations of interest or danger of any kind, but on hearts melted by a sense of the unutterable love of God. It is also in obedience to the same instinct of spiritual wisdom that

Howard and Elizabeth Fry, with the men and women who have followed them in their mission to carry the Gospel into prisons, and among convicted felons, are found to have trusted almost exclusively to the power of Christian sympathy, aided by a gentle and kind manner, as a means of subduing those who feared neither God nor man, neither death nor hell. Let me add, that not more than forty years ago a confirmed drunkard was generally regarded as incorrigible. At last it occurred to a few reformers that the supposed incorrigibility of the drunkard might be owing, not to insensibility to his degradation, but to distrust of his competency to escape from it; in other words, that he did not stand in need of menace, or even of rebuke or warning, so much as of sympathy and encouragement. Here was a great moral discovery, and hence, in no small measure, the new life in the Temperance cause, and the marvellous success which has attended it.

But if this is true of hardened and abandoned sinners, how much more so of all such as still have their misgivings and relentings, whose sin consists, for the most part, in halting between two opinions, not having made up their minds what course to take, or having made them up only so far as this, that they will become religious at some future day, but not yet. Speaking generally, such persons do not need to be convinced that religion is the best and only safe course. When they read the life of an enlightened and consistent Christian, or meet with one in their intercourse with society, they cannot help wishing that they were just such a man; that they had his faith and his works and his prospects. But there are obstacles, discouragements in the way. They think it would be harder work for them to be Christians than for most men; that it is beyond their reach, at least for the present; that it would be vanity or presumption in them to make the attempt. Now, I ask, how are these obstacles, all consisting radically in a want of confidence, most likely to be removed or overcome? Clearly and incontestably as the Gospel aims to do it; — by inspiring new confidence, by holding out the promise of sympathy and help; by a divinely authenticated dispensation of encouragement. “We are saved by hope.”

But if I were to stop here, half of my purpose would be left unaccomplished. All will agree, I doubt not, that life without hope from any quarter would be insupportable. Still, some may ask, why look to religion, why look to Christianity for this hope? Why not hope each one in the strength of his own right arm, or in what the world has to promise, or simply in the righteousness of his claim?

To answer these questions intelligibly and satisfactorily, it will be necessary to speak of the nature and excellence of the Christian hope.

In the first place, the Christian hope is not limited and bounded, like all worldly, irreligious, infidel hopes, by what man can do. In a storm at sea we naturally and properly look to the pilot; if dangerously sick ourselves, or if our friends are dangerously sick, we naturally and properly look to the physician; in civil troubles we naturally and properly look to the experienced and trustworthy statesman. But we know beforehand that the pilot, the physician, the statesman can do so much and no more; and when this point is reached, to whom are we to look? There are situations, and they too of not infrequent occurrence, in which the offer of human aid, however kindly intended, seems almost like mockery. This may not be my situation, or yours, at the present moment; but it will be sooner or later,—before many years, perhaps before many days; and what shall we look to then? If our hope is in man alone, it is plainly one which is crumbling, day by day, into dust. Unless we recognize the being, and trust in the presence and agency of a Higher Power, the hour is coming, every setting sun is bringing us one day nearer to it, when the soul will be without hope. Despair will take the place of hope. Here also it is of importance to observe, that, with persons of reflection and forethought, whatever is seen to end in despair, begins in despair.

sists in its not being limited and bounded, as all worldly, irreligious, and infidel hopes must be, by the present life. Hope, to be hope, must not be liable to be swept away by the very vicissitudes under which it is to sustain and cheer us. The first Christians shared but the common fate of earnest and devoted men in difficult times; yet one of them could say: "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable." The hope "in this life only" is one which plays along the pathways of youth and wealth and power, but leaves the wronged and the forsaken to weep and die. Go with this hope into the abodes of extreme penury and want; go with it to the bedside of one who is suffering under an incurable malady. It may answer well enough for the house of feasting and merriment, where hope is not wanted; but go with it where hope is most wanted, go with it to the house of mourning, where death has just stricken down the joy or the stay of that now desolate home. What can it do? Almost the entire language of condolence under grief, hardship, and oppression is borrowed from the Bible, and owes its significance and force to the Christian doctrine that "the sufferings of this present time are not worthy to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed in us." Even those who do not profess to be religious themselves, participate more or less in the benefits of the common hope,—through a common sympathy, if not through a common conviction. The soothing effects of the prayer or the hymn reach every heart.

A third circumstance distinguishing the Christian hope is, that, unlike all worldly, irreligious, infidel hopes, it does not profess to measure itself by the real or supposed deserts of the individual, but by the boundless goodness and mercy of the Supreme Disposer. Some preachers are accustomed to speak of human nature in the most disparaging terms, representing man's best services as no better than a hollow pretence, an outside show, a false glitter. If they speak thus from conviction of its truth, not a word is to be said; every one must preach what he believes. But if they think by rhetorical exaggerations of human depravity to inculcate humility and self-abasement, it would be well for them to consider whether language of this kind is as likely to humble men as it is to degrade and discourage them; whether it is as likely to rouse them to exertion, as it is to suggest a good, or at least a plausible excuse for not so much as making the attempt. For this reason, I have no wish to join in any sweeping and indiscriminate repudiation of human virtue. Still I think all must agree that this virtue is too imperfect even in the best men, and that in most men it is alloyed and offset by too many vices or failings, to authorize them to expect much on the score of absolute merit. Hope, therefore, that is founded on merit alone is not suited to the actual condition of mankind. Accordingly the Gospel is conceived on the plan of providing, not only recompense for the righteous, but also encouragement and hope for sinners. It begins with us as sinners; it addresses us as sinners, and sinners we are; and the excellency of "the hope set before us" is, that there is nothing in our sins to exclude us from it, if we repent and turn to God. Under the Christian dispensation it is impiety to despair of God's mercy on account of our past sins; for this would be to suppose these sins to be greater than His mercy. Of course, when we compare what we are and what we can do, with what we hope to receive, we cannot fail to be struck with the infinite disparity; but neither is this just ground for misgivings. What is promised is to be regarded, not as being of the nature of wages for work done, but as being of the nature of a gift on condition of obedience; and in this character, as a gift, it takes its proportions, not from our poor earnings, but from the munificence of the Giver.

These, then, are the characteristics by which the Christian hope is distinguished from all worldly, irreligious, infidel hopes. It is not bounded and limited by human weakness, by the narrow scope of this life, or the poor deserts of the individual, but measures itself by the possible succors of the Almighty, by the range of eternity, and by the infinite benignity and clemency of our heavenly Father.

Who, it may be asked in conclusion, does not feel his need of this hope? I speak to many who are not unhappy now; but I speak to none who are not unhappy at times. This thought should chasten our feelings of confidence and security even when we happen to be free from pain and sorrow; and reconcile us to them when they come, as the common and inevitable lot. Above all; it should lead us to put ourselves into a condition to meet the disastrous vicissitudes of human life with composure and dignity. There is, I know, a kind of philosophy, which is sometimes set forward as a substitute for religion in such cases. This philosophy will tell you, that everything is determined and fixed by an inexorable fate; that it is mere weakness and folly, therefore, to tremble and shrink at what is inevitable,—to give way to regrets and apprehensions which can be of no avail. As if men shrank from evil because they expected to gain by such conduct; as if it were a voluntary thing with them whether to feel dread, or not. Discipline, habit, this philosophy, if you please, may help them to conceal their dread, and make it consistent with presence of mind, and a manly composure ; it may make them still, but the stillness is that of despair, and not of hope. The groans are not there, but the torment is there, and not the less because the usual signs of it are suppressed. In one respect religion, I admit, resembles this philosophy ; it teaches us, like this philosophy, that everything is determined and fixed ; but here the resemblance ends. Religion teaches us that everything is determined and fixed, not by a blind and inexorable fate, but by an infinitely wise and good Being ; and here is ground for confidence and implicit trust, — a reason why we should put away our fears ; — not, indeed, because everything is determined and fixed, so that our fears can be of no avail, but because everything is so determined and fixed that all will come right at last, leaving us no occasion for fear. Hence it is the believer alone who is able to say, “ Why art thou cast down, O my soul ? and why art thou disquieted within me ? Hope thou in God ; for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.”

Again, who would not cultivate this hope ? As religious dispositions are not of this world, they are not likely to spring up spontaneously under worldly appliances, amidst worldly avocations. Religion, religion at least in its highest forms, is a delicate exotic, which must not be expected to grow wild in the fields ; it must be nurtured with effort and care ; it must be sheltered from all ungenial influences, and surrounded, as far as may be, with the atmosphere, so to speak, of its native heaven. Why wonder that our affections are not set on things above, while almost everything we are saying and doing tends to set them on things on the earth ? Why wonder that we do not find the pleasure and satisfaction in religion of which others tell, if accustomed to think of it only at remote intervals, and then chiefly as a law to curb our passions, or as an avenger to punish our misdeeds ? We must cultivate, we must assiduously cultivate a temper of cheerful, grateful, childlike trust in our heavenly Father, by acts of duty and humanity, by prayer and all holy exercises, and, above all, by making ourselves familiar with the pure, meek, loving spirit of Jesus, which will generate in us not only righteousness, but that peculiar form of righteousness whereby the Christian is known. In this way Christ will be formed in us the hope of glory ; “ for the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did, by the which we draw nigh unto God.” It may be said, that to be without this hope, is to fail in happiness ; not in duty. But we should consider, that if it is not to fail in duty, it is to fail in the motives to duty, which in effect will amount to the same thing. Hence, as Jeremy Taylor has said, “ a man may be damned for despairing to be saved.”

Finally, who would knowingly and willingly disappoint or frustrate this hope? Because a man has hope in Christ it does not follow that this hope is well founded in his case. Our very hope may perish; nay, it will do so, unless we establish it in righteousness, and unless "we show the same diligence, to the full assurance of hope, unto the end."

THE DIFFERENCES AMONG CHRISTIANS NO OBJECTION TO CHRISTIANITY.

IS CHRIST DIVIDED? — 1 Corinthians i. 13.

THE differences among Christians are frequently referred to at the present day. To some they are a reason for scepticism; to some, an excuse for indifference; to some, an occasion for cynical and contemptuous reflections on truth and human nature.

To understand this subject aright, it will be necessary to begin by considering, how it is that men come to differ in morals and religion.

Almost every action, character, or doctrine, on which we are called upon to make up an opinion, is more or less complex; that is to say, has more than one side or aspect. This being the case, if one man regards it on one side, under one aspect, and another regards it on another side, and under another aspect, their impressions will be different, at least they ought to be. It does not follow that one is true, and the other false: both may be true; that is, just and faithful representations of the same reality, only under different aspects.

You know how it is with views of a church, or palace, or mountain, taken from different positions. The views themselves are different; nevertheless they are views of the same thing, and all of them faithful representations of the reality, though not of the same side of it. Very probably, if a man has always been accustomed to regard the object from one position alone, he will hardly recognize it in any of the views except in those taken from the same, or a near position. For this reason one man may recognize the object in one of the views, and not in the rest; another man may recognize the object in another of the views, and not in the rest; and so on. It is not that the rest are not as faithful and true representations of the object; only they are not representations of that aspect of the object, of which alone the individual in question is cognizant.

This illustration will help us to account for the origin of those differences in morals, which have been thought by some to throw everything into doubt. Thus it has been said, that not a vice can be named which has not been practised in some ages, and in some countries, as a virtue. For example, assassination, infanticide, robbery, have all been committed, in certain states of society, without apparent compunction,—nay, sometimes with the countenance and support of public opinion, as being necessary, useful, or heroic acts. Ethical writers, in order to account for these anomalies, have been in the habit of ascribing them to differences of culture, and differences of physical and social circumstances; and these, doubtless, are among the principal remote causes which conspire to bring about the results in question. But how do they bring them about? Simply and solely by leading men to regard the action to be pronounced upon under a particular point of view, and under that alone. In this way retaliation for wrong, under the form of assassination and revenge, in a rude state of society, or in very unsettled times, may come to be regarded as a kind of wild justice, and the only justice accessible, and so be approved; for this certainly is one of the aspects of such actions at such times, and it may be the only one which strikes minds thus situated. And so of the other cases. I am not aware of a single vicious action which was ever held as right, unless, in the circumstances, it really had a good or plausible side, on which alone, from some cause, it was contemplated, the whole action being judged by this one side.

The same account is also to be given of the origin of most of our differences in religious doctrine when sincerely entertained. Take, for instance, what is perhaps the most fundamental difference of all, the different opinions which have prevailed respecting human nature. Who does not know that man actually appears under all these various aspects?—sometimes but little lower than the angels, and sometimes but little better than a fiend. Hence the most extreme and contradictory views on this subject are so far well founded as this, that they are faithful and true representations of real phases of human nature, the error consisting not in misconceiving or misrepresenting some single phase, but in judging our whole nature by that alone.

We arrive, then, at this conclusion: real and sincere differences in morals and religion originate for the most part in the fact, that men regard the matter in question from different positions, and of course under different aspects, each one judging the whole matter by that particular aspect of it which happens to be turned towards him. And if so, then it follows, that what we call errors are not so much false as partial views of the reality. A celebrated French writer has said, “that, if we except the common maxims of morality, there is no one truth which can boast of having been so generally adopted, or through such a succession of ages, as certain ridiculous and pernicious errors.”* The statement has been objected to as an exaggeration; but even if it were not, to what would it amount? Simply to this, that thus far partial views, espe-

Such being the origin and nature of most religious differences, it will next be in order to inquire on what grounds they can be regarded as a reason or occasion for sceptical, or cynical, or desponding thoughts.

In the first place, do they afford us any reason or pretext for denying the trustworthiness or competency of the human faculties? Certainly not. If, indeed, as the language sometimes used on this subject would seem to imply, we actually saw differently, one man from another, and the same man from himself at different times, there would be some ground for despair of the human faculties. But we do not see differently. From what has been said it appears, that, though we receive different impressions from the same object, it is not because we see differently, but because we look at different sides of the object, and regard it under different lights, or from different positions. Could we be induced to regard the object under precisely the same lights and aspects, we should doubtless see it alike; and better still, could we be induced to regard the object under all lights and aspects, we should doubtless not only see it alike, but see it as it is.

not to be construed into evidence of the incompetency of the human faculties in themselves considered, but only of their partial application. This, however, it may be argued, is merely to give another explanation of the evil, without removing or lessening it; the partial application always existing will render the conflicting views of the different sects alike unsatisfactory and worthless, and mutually destructive of each other.

But why assume that the partial application will always exist? When we begin our inquiries respecting any subject, we must begin, of course, by looking at it on one side: our views must be partial at first; but it does not follow that they must always continue so. What, indeed, is progress in any inquiry but the gradual enlargement of our views, which supposes them to become less and less partial? And hence the generally acknowledged fact, that thought and study, a wider observation and a more generous culture, tend to dissolve differences and bring men together.

To this some may object the permanent existence of religious sects, retaining all their jealousies and antipathies against each other. But it should be remembered that these sects exist in a twofold character, as parties striving for power, and as schools of theology seeking the truth; and that it is only in the latter capacity that we are concerned with them here. Now, the rise and progress of sects, considered as schools of theology, would seem to be as follows: A number of persons are led by various causes — some historical, some local, some personal — to concur in regarding Christianity from a particular position, — on one of its sides, and therefore under one of its various aspects. The consequence is, that, though the view is a partial one, it is one in which the whole sect agree; differing, at the same time, from all other sects, who, in a similar way, have been led to adopt and agree in some other partial view. Now, we say, that, as knowledge advances, there is nothing to hinder these sects, any more than so many individuals; from making their views less and less partial, which will have the effect to bring them nearer and nearer together; for though partial views of truth are many and various, truth comprehended in its entireness is one. Nay, more; what we thus see might take place, is taking place continually; in some cases, complete amalgamations of sects; in others, unions and alliances for certain purposes; and even where, for political reasons, the old names and organizations are strenuously maintained, and with them some of the old jealousies and antipathies, it is seldom without some abatement of the rigor of the old doctrine. The Calvinism of to-day is a very different thing from Calvin's Calvinism.

To those, therefore, who think to find arguments for scepticism or despair in the differences and divisions of Christians, and who are ready to pronounce the partial views which prevail as unsatisfactory, worthless, and mutually destructive of each other, the answer is plain and conclusive. In the first place, even the most partial of these views are worth a great deal; for they are partial views of an all-important truth, and as such contain much that is enduring and eternal. Again, as the error of these views grows mainly out of their being partial, it is one which must be expected to pertain to the first stages of every inquiry, but gradually disappear as the inquiry goes on. And, finally, though it is too much to hope that the time will ever come on earth when all religious differences will be healed, or, in other words, when the multitude of partial views will be swallowed up and lost in a single all-comprehensive view, still we are to consider that this knowing "in part," and prophesying "in part," and the trials and responsibilities which pertain to such a condition, may be of advantage while it lasts, — may be essential to the discipline which is to fit us for that world, where "that which is in part shall be done away."

Admitting all this, however, it may still be contended that I have not touched, as yet, the real "stone of stumbling and rock of offence;" which is not these differences and divisions, simply considered, but the controversies to which they have given birth. I ask, then, what there is in these controversies, — I do not say to condemn, for, considering how they are often conducted, there is enough in them, Heaven knows, to condemn, — but to authorize, or invite, or excuse, in lookers on, either indifference or unbelief?

Certainly of themselves they do not argue indifference or unbelief; but the contrary. An age of controversy is pre-eminently an age of faith; a man is not likely to dispute earnestly unless he believes in something, and attaches importance to it. Luther was the greatest disputant of his day; but he did not speak or write or act like one who looked on religion as a sham or a dream or a shifting cloud. These controversies, by the manner in which they are carried on, may sometimes show the distemper of the times; they are symptomatic, it may be, of moral disorders, but they prove, at any rate, that men are not spiritually dead.

Besides, how is it in other things? Name, if you can, a single interesting and important subject of inquiry which has not given occasion to controversy, and led, in the language of the Apostle, to “envying, and strife, and divisions.” At this moment the world is about as much divided, and, may I not add? about as much estranged, on scientific and political and philanthropic questions as on religious questions. But do men hence infer that there is no such thing as truth in any of these matters, or that we have no faculties to discover it? God forbid! It is often in the sharp collision of many minds that the sacred spark is struck out. Controversy, with all its objectionable liabilities, is nevertheless the great stimulant and purifier of thought, the appointed means by which the mind struggles on in every pursuit, and communicates and establishes the progress it has made.

Obviously, therefore, it cannot be controversy, as such, that is objected to in this connection, but something peculiar to religious controversy.

In the first place, it is said that controversy is well enough where it really has the effect to help forward the truth, or to diffuse and establish it; but in religion it does neither, leaving every question just where it found it. I reply, that even if this were so, it would not be to the purpose: it would follow, indeed, that controversy is of no use in religion, and ought to be avoided; but it would not follow, that religion itself is of no use, or that controversy has made it of less use or less certain. But the whole statement is erroneous. There are those, who, from extreme distaste for speculation, or for want of what is called speculative power, are fond of admitting the advances made by the experimental sciences, but still contend that the speculative sciences are just where they were when men first began to think. But this doctrine, an extravagance at best, when applied to the understanding of Christianity, becomes manifestly absurd; for here we have to do, not only with speculation, but with history and criticism. Who has yet to learn the invaluable services of discussion and controversy in settling the laws of evidence on which the genuineness and authenticity of the Sacred Books depend, and the laws of interpretation by which their import is determined? To discussion and controversy we also owe it, that the Christian doctrines generally have been unfolded, cleared up, and re-stated. Even where the old terms are to a certain extent retained, discussion and controversy have compelled the resort to new explications more in accordance with the advanced state of society and human intelligence.

Again; religious controversy is objected to because of its asperities, and spirit of denunciation, which on such a subject are peculiarly odious, creating in some minds an invincible disgust for religion itself. That religious controversy, even among Christians, sometimes assumes the character here given to it, I am sorry to be obliged to confess; but it is easy to see that it is not because Christians are Christians, but because Christians are men, having the weaknesses and imperfections of men. Besides, the very intemperance of the controversy proves thus much at least, that there is something in the subject by which men are powerfully moved. Does party spirit run highest when there is nothing at stake? When the question is one of life and death, — of eternal life and eternal death, — we can hardly expect that well-disposed persons will always stop to measure and exactly balance their words. Nay, this spirit of denunciation, for which so much disgust is felt or affected,—I trust, after what has been said, I shall not be suspected of going too far, when I say, that it admits of an explanation less dishonorable to society and human nature, than the opposite vice of indifferentism. As we have shown, men take different sides in religion, because they view it on different sides. What they see, they really see; and by gazing on it intently they come at length to see it so plainly as to conclude, that those who do not see it as they do must be wilfully blind. They denounce them, therefore, not as rejecting this or that particular exposition of truth, but as being enemies of truth itself.

Once more. A vague notion exists, I believe, in some minds, that the honor of God is somehow implicated in and compromised by the disgraceful altercations to which Christianity has given birth. The fact that he does not interfere to suppress them creates a feeling of uneasiness and distrust, as if the revelation were not in reality from him. Such persons would do well to remember that God gives us truth, as he gives us everything else, not to our acceptance, but to our acquisition. Even the truths of revelation are expected to do us as much good by exercising our fairness of mind, and our love of truth, in the acceptance and interpretation of his Word, as by the light they give. Consult the analogies of nature. In the legislation of Heaven, there is nothing corresponding to Acts of Uniformity. Reflection, and a proper understanding of the world and human nature must convince all, I think, that these dissensions and controversies, though an evil as often conducted, are yet necessary to balance or expel still greater evils. Certain it is, that there never has been so little real religion in the Church, nor so many scandalous excesses and immoralities, as in times when controversy was hushed. In our own day what has led men to search the Scriptures with such intense interest, what has moved them to engage in many noble enterprises, what has led to increased watchfulness, decorum, and fidelity in ministers and private Christians? I cannot help thinking, that among the causes which have brought about what is most bright and promising in the present aspect of things, a high place should be assigned to our contentions, and, I may even add, to the jealousies and rivalships which these contentions have engendered. These are not, perhaps, the highest or the purest motives from which a man can act; but it is certainly better that we should be "provoked" to love and good works, to useful and noble exertion, even by such motives, rather than be given up to indifference, self-indulgence, and a general laxity of manners.

Still, the great practical difficulty, some may insist, remains: amidst this multitude of partial and discordant views, which are we to adopt? To say that we should "prove all things and hold fast that which is good," is a sufficient answer to theologians; but only a few are theologians: others, that is, the bulk of Christians, are not in a condition to "prove all things." Neither will it do to say, that we should select what is common to all these views, and hold to that. For who is to tell us what is common to all these views? and who knows but that what is common to them all to-day, may have to submit to modification to-morrow, as other and more extreme views may be disclosed? Besides, suppose that we have obtained what is common to all views, and that this is absolutely true, it is nevertheless but the skeleton of truth, without life or power. To the question, then, Which among the various partial and discordant views you are to adopt, this is my answer, — Adopt your own; hold fast your own. Allowing others to have their views, be faithful and just to your own view; endeavoring, of course, to enlarge it from day to day, but adhering to it, meanwhile, and reverencing it, as one view at least of truth, and of that side of truth which is turned towards you, and which, therefore, you must be presumed to be most concerned to know.

Christ is not divided. We all drink from the same "Spiritual Rock," and that Rock is Christ. There is a living tie of faith, submission, and love which binds us all, if not to one another, at least to one and the same living Head. Again I say, though we are divided, Christ is not divided; and this is our hope; "an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil." Our views are still partial, and therefore discordant; but we must believe that they will become less and less so, for they are views of Him who "is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever." What we know not here, we shall know hereafter: the day is coming when, for those who love Christ sincerely, that which is in part shall be done away, and they shall know even as they are known; and there shall be one fold and one Shepherd.

THE DAY OF JUDGMENT.

AND I SAW THE DEAD, SMALL AND GREAT, STAND BEFORE GOD : AND THE BOOKS WERE OPENED : AND ANOTHER BOOK WAS OPENED, WHICH IS THE BOOK OF LIFE : AND THE DEAD WERE JUDGED OUT OF THOSE THINGS WHICH WERE WRITTEN IN THE BOOKS, ACCORDING TO THEIR WORKS. — Revelation xx. 12.

It belongs to man, in which he would seem to differ essentially from the inferior animals, to make himself and his own thoughts an object of thought ; not only to know what he is doing, but to be able to review his conduct and compare it with an ideal standard of expediency and right ; in one word, to call himself to account. Not only is he able to do this, but through his intellectual and moral constitution it is forced on him as a practical necessity. In every human mind, according to its measure of activity and self-consciousness, this process of self-judgment is continually going on ; and no small part of our happiness and misery on earth is traceable to it, — that is to say, to the pleasures of self-approbation, and the pains of remorse. There is, therefore, an important sense in which the whole of human life is one continued Day of Judgment.

Moreover, the self-judgment here referred to is understood and felt to be of an authority and sanction higher than that of man. We cannot shake off the conviction that there is a divine, as well as a human, element in conscience. The opinion which we form as to what is right in any particular instance, is a mere human opinion. It may be true, and it may be false; one thing to-day, and another thing to-morrow. But the sense of obligation under which we are all laid to judge ourselves by some acknowledged standard of right, and to bring ourselves into conformity to it as we best can, is not human. It does not depend on our own will. It is the decree of our nature; and our nature is the decree of God. It is the voice of God speaking to us through the human faculties, ordained by him for that purpose. Who can believe that God has so made us, that we cannot help judging ourselves by the law of right, without believing, at the same time, that he intended us to be judged, and rewarded or punished according to that law?

On looking round, however, we see that this law is very far from being universally applied, or fully carried out in the present life. Nothing is easier than to say, that virtue is its own reward, and vice its own punishment. So perhaps it would be, if the natural and legitimate tendencies of virtue and vice were never obstructed, or turned aside; but, as things go in this world, we know that in point of fact they are obstructed and turned aside in a thousand ways; and the consequence is, that in cases without number the wicked prosper, and the righteous are trodden down. Let no one think to shake this conclusion by insisting that the tendencies of virtue and vice, referred to above, are natural and eternal, whilst the obstacles to their becoming effect in this world are accidental and temporary. It is enough for the argument to know, that the obstacles in question, whether accidental and temporary or not, will last as long as this life lasts. Thus much being conceded, it follows incontestably, that, if there is ever to be a perfectly righteous retribution, we must look for it beyond the grave. Clement of Rome has handed down a tradition in the Church, that the Apostle Peter was so much impressed by this view of the subject as to be in the habit of exclaiming, "God is just; therefore, the soul is immortal."

By such natural intimations as these, almost every people, with or without the aid of revelation, have been led to entertain, with more or less distinctness and confidence, the presentiment of "a judgment to come." Even in Homer there are unmistakable traces of a popular belief in a future state of existence, where the fate of the individual is made to turn, more or less, on his previous character, and especially on his conduct towards the gods. The same is also laid down as a practical doctrine of great moment by the best among the pagan philosophers and moralists; and sometimes, as in the apologue of Erus the Pamphylian, given in Plato's Republic, in language bearing a striking resemblance to that used four hundred years afterwards in the New Testament. A brave man, having fallen in battle, was permitted to return to the earth on the twelfth day, in order to warn the living by a revelation of what he had seen. He had seen the dead arraigned, and when the judges, to borrow the words of the apologue, "gave judgment, they commanded the just to go on the right hand, and upwards through the heaven, having fitted marks on the front of those that had been judged; but the unjust they commanded to the left, and downwards, and these likewise had behind them marks of all that they had done."

There are those, I am aware, who make no account of pagan notions of a future retribution, on the ground that they neither amounted to a proper faith, nor had the influence of a proper faith. We are told, for example, that Cicero, though he insists on the doctrine in his philosophical writings, takes occasion in more than one instance to deride or disown it in private correspondence with his friends. The argument, however, is not of much weight; for, in the first place, what Cicero derides and disowns is often, not the fact of a future retribution, but the popular superstitions respecting it, in the second place, even if his misgivings occasionally go deeper, is it without precedent that very good and pious men should be subject at times to moods, during which they can hardly be said to believe in anything? and, lastly, the individual selected as a representative may be objected to, for it has never been understood that Cicero was a very good, and much less a very pious or religious man, even for the age in which he lived. If, then, a still broader ground should be taken; if it should be contended that the life of pagans cannot be reconciled with a sincere belief in a righteous retribution, I freely admit the difficulty: but it is a difficulty which does not end with the pagans. I ask you to reconcile, if you can, the actual life of Christendom itself with the general acceptance of that doctrine. Probably the solution of the difficulty is the same in both cases. As a general rule, men do not act out their opinions, their theories, their real convictions, certainly not with much strictness, whatever they may be: they act out their passions, propensities, and habits; and these again depend, in no small measure, on organization, and on the customs and institutions of society, that is to say, on physical and local causes, many of which it is impossible either to trace or explain.

From the pagans we pass to the Jews, among whom Christianity arose. Moses, their great Lawgiver, aimed to establish what is called a theocracy, that is a government of God upon earth, in which perfect righteousness was to be fulfilled. Of course, in such a state of things, as they had a present Divine judgment, there was the less occasion to appeal to a future Divine judgment. Nevertheless, I cannot help thinking that those who go so far as to deny a distinct recognition of another world in the Old Testament, and even in the earlier parts of it, must find extreme difficulty in explaining certain passages, especially such traditions as those respecting the translation of Enoch and Elijah. Be this, however, as it may, there can be no doubt that in the time of our Lord the great body of the Jewish people had become believers in the doctrine of a future state of rewards and punishments. In the apocryphal "Book of Wisdom," supposed to have been written about a century before Christ, we find a passage on this subject which might have come from an apostle: "But the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and there shall no torment touch them. In the sight of the unwise they seem to die; and their departure is taken for misery, and their going from us to be utter destruction ; but they are in peace. For though they be punished in the sight of men, yet is their hope full of immortality ; and having been a little chastised, they shall be greatly rewarded : for God proved them, and found them worthy of himself."

Accordingly, the doctrine of a future state of retribution cannot be accounted a Christian doctrine in the sense of being first taught in Christianity. How, then, it may be asked, are we to understand that passage in St. Paul's Second Epistle to Timothy, in which he speaks of "the appearing of our Saviour Jesus Christ, who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel" ? I answer, that to bring a subject "to light" does not necessarily mean to make it known for the first time, but to make it more generally and fully known, — to illustrate it, to clear it up, to set it in its true light, so that all may see it as it is. And this is precisely what Christianity has done for "life and immortality." It has given us new evidence of the facts in the case ; it has enabled us to see these facts in new lights, and under new aspects and relations : so that the whole doctrine, in itself considered, has become substantially a new doctrine.

This being the case, it remains for me to speak of what may properly be considered as peculiar and original in the Christian doctrine of the judgment to come.

In the first place, I attach but little, if any, importance to the distinction insisted on by Bishop Butler. According to him, "all which can positively be asserted to be matter of mere revelation, with regard to the future judgment, seems to be, that the great distinction between the righteous and the wicked shall be made at the end of this world; that each shall then receive according to his deserts." * On the contrary, the whole doctrine of a day of judgment — of a single day or a set time for all mankind — seems to me to have originated in the mistake of construing passages literally which were intended to be understood figuratively. If we insist on construing these passages literally, consistency would seem to require us to go further still. We must believe not merely in a day, but also in a place, — nay, more, in real books, in a real consultation of records; in short, in all the paraphernalia of a human tribunal. Let me not be suspected of objecting to or undervaluing those representations of Scripture which bring up the vision of all mankind standing before the judgment-seat of Christ, "that every one may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad." In no other way would it be possible sufficiently to impress the imagination and the feelings with that greatest and most solemn of realities, — namely, that you and I, and every one that lives, will have to answer in the spirit for what is done in the body. It is only necessary, that, in our sober thinking, we should not confound the truth which is conveyed under the images in question with the images themselves.

On the whole, the most natural and Christian view would seem to be, that, with every individual, as soon as this life ends the next life begins. Else how could our Saviour say to the penitent thief on the cross, "To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise"? or Paul, of Christians generally, "We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord"? or Stephen exclaim in the agonies of death, "Lord Jesus! receive my spirit"? Without pretending, therefore, to be wise above what is written, I think we may safely hold, that the day of judgment to every individual will be the day of his death. It will begin then; by what processes and instrumentalities it will be carried on, and how or when it will end, are among the secret things which belong to the Lord our God. If you wish to be told the details of what is to be in the life to come, you must not go to the Gospel; you must go to the Koran, which is full of it. As regards everything pertaining to the form and manner—or, so to speak, the outward appearance—of the invisible world, what most distinguishes Christianity when compared with other and false religions, — what indeed, on the negative side, may be regarded as peculiar and original in it, — is, not the fulness of the information it conveys, but its discreet and solemn reserve. In the not very frequent allusions to the subject the language is purposely varied, so that the most cursory reader might not fall into the mistake of understanding it to the letter. One thing, however, is put beyond question, — happiness to the good, misery to the bad ; that is, all that can give moral effect to the revelation : not a word, not a syllable, either to stimulate or gratify an idle and impertinent curiosity.

But these things are comparatively of small moment. What chiefly and essentially distinguishes the Christian doctrine of the final judgment has nothing to do with the time and circumstances of that event ; it relates to the principle, to the law by which everything is then to be determined. “ Who will render to every man according to his deeds : to them who, by patient continuance in well-doing, seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life ; but unto them that are contentious, and do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, indignation and wrath ; tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doeth evil, — of the Jew first, and also of the Gentile ; but glory, honor, and peace to every man that worketh good,

— to the Jew first, and also to the Gentile ; for there is no respect of persons with God.” The same ground is also taken by another apostle : “ Then Peter opened his mouth and said, ‘ Of a truth I perceive that God is no respecter of persons ; but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.’ ” A multitude of such passages might be cited from the apostolic writings ; and they do but reassert what our Lord himself had expressly taught in the Sermon on the Mount : “ Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven ; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many will say to me in that day, ‘ Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name ? and in thy name have cast out devils ? and in thy name have done many wonderful works ? ’ And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you : depart from me, ye that work iniquity.”

We are so accustomed to language like this in the New Testament as to be hardly in a condition to see in it anything peculiar or original. But where will you find its parallel ? Certainly not in any of the thousand forms of polytheism which have prevailed in the world. I do not say, I have no right to say, even of these, certainly not of the best of them, that they entirely exclude moral ideas or a moral accountability. But need I remind you how often even the purest of them represent justice as interfered with by jealousies and rivalships among the Divinities themselves, or by partiality or favoritism for particular communities or particular individuals? how often they speak of the anger of the gods as directed, not against unrighteousness, but against some personal slight or neglect? And what shall I say of Judaism? Every thoughtful reader must be struck with the lofty tone of monotheistic morality pervading the Old Testament; but it was never understood to come up to the Christian standard; it is expressly said in the Sermon on the Mount not to do so. Judaism is marred throughout — sometimes in principle, and still oftener in spirit — by the narrowness and arrogance of a people educated in the belief that God was their God in a sense in which he was not the God of all mankind. Nowhere but in Christianity will you find it distinctly laid down, as of Divine authority, that every man is to be judged at last by what he has himself done, whether it be good or bad.

Let us now go one step further, and ascertain, if we can, precisely what is meant when it is said, that men are to be judged “according to their deeds.” I believe there are those who interpret it to mean, that a sort of moral account current is opened with every man, as soon as he comes to years of discretion, in which he is credited for all his virtues and charged with all his sins, and that he will be rewarded or punished in the end for each particular act. Mr. Locke must have entertained some such notion when arguing that, before a man can be justly punished in the next life for the sins committed here, those sins must be brought to his remembrance; that is, he must be conscious of having committed those particular sins. And so Coleridge, who, after advancing the conjecture that "the resurrection body" may so stimulate the memory, as to bring before every human soul the collective experience of its whole past existence, adds: "And this,—this, perchance, is the dread Book of Judgment, in whose mysterious hieroglyphics every idle word is recorded." All such speculations originate, as it seems to me, in the common error of pushing too far the analogy between the human and the Divine administrations of justice. The distinction here to be taken into view is sufficiently obvious. We were told long ago, that "the Lord seeth not as man seeth; for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart." If, therefore, there is one thing clearer than any other in Christian ethics, it is this,—that every man is to stand or fall according to what he is in himself;—not by what he does, except in so far as it expresses what he really is. Acts of worship in a hypocrite, munificent gifts merely for the name of it, solemn make-beliefs of the would-be worshipper of God and the world at the same time, go for nothing. The question continually returns, What is the man in himself? Not that the language used in Scripture in speaking of the final judgment is to be excepted to or set aside, in any manner or degree. It is still as true as ever that we shall all be judged at the last "according to what we have done, whether it be good or bad," because this will have made us to be what we are; nevertheless everything at the Judgment Day will depend on what we are. There is, therefore, no occasion for the nice balancing of accounts, item by item, referred to above; neither is there any occasion for a miraculous memory to enable us to call to mind every thought we have indulged, every word we have uttered, and every action we have performed. It will be enough, if we know in what moral and spiritual state all these have left us; and to know this it will be enough, if we are made conscious of what we are.

This view of the case — distinctly apprehended and firmly held — will help to reconcile an apparent discrepancy in the Scriptures as to the person of the Judge. Thus, in one place we are told that "God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good or whether it be evil." In another place it is said, "the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son.” And, in still another place, our Lord himself is represented as saying: “And if any man hear my words, and believe not, I judge him not: for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. He that rejecteth me, and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him; the Word that I have spoken, the same shall judge him at the last day.” Now there is plainly no contradiction, no difficulty here, provided only that we dismiss the imagination of a formal trial, and make the future judgment to consist in the fact, that every soul will become happy or miserable at death, according to its conscious deserts. The judgment thus understood, we may say with equal truth, looking at the subject under different points of view, that God is the Judge, that Christ is the Judge, or that the Gospel is the Judge. God is the Judge, inasmuch as all justice has its origin and foundation in the absolute holiness and rectitude of the Divine nature. Christ is the Judge, inasmuch as he is the dispenser of Divine justice on earth; it is in and through Him that this justice is made known among men, and applied to human affairs. And finally, the Gospel is the Judge, inasmuch as it is the expression of the Divine justice, that is, it sets forth the laws and conditions of spiritual life and spiritual death, according to which every soul will take its appropriate place in the eternal world.

The last-mentioned statement makes it necessary to glance at one question more. We say, every soul will take its appropriate place in the next life ; but why do so in the next life, any more than in this ?

There may be agencies and appliances to carry into effect the righteous retributions of eternity, of which, with our present faculties and experience, we can form no conception. But it is hardly necessary to resort to what may be termed the argument from ignorance. There is one thing which we know. We know why it is that a righteous retribution is not more generally reached in the life that now is. We know, for example, why it is that a mean man lifts up his head in good society ; why it is that a designing politician often passes for a sincere patriot ; why it is that showy manners often go for more than substantial virtues ; why it is that, in the struggle for wealth and honor, the bad man often succeeds, and the good man often fails. It is because the purely moral aspect of things has comparatively little to do in determining our condition here. It is because a multitude of influences, having little or nothing to do with virtue or vice are constantly at work in this world to modify the opinions entertained of us by others, and even by ourselves. Here things are not as they seem. We walk in "a vain show." It is only necessary to suppose, therefore, that death will have the effect to strip off these disguises ; it is only necessary to assume that this imposing but hollow masquerade will come to an end, and then every soul will seem to be what it is, and take its place accordingly. Glimpses are sometimes given us of what is to be expected when the world is judged in righteousness, and the secrets of all hearts are laid bare; and it is always, as our argument would lead us to anticipate, when for some reason moral causes have become for the time all in all. It is when man forgets everything else, and thinks only of his relations to a holy and merciful God; — as in the joy and peace of the new convert, and in the remorse and despair of the stricken soul. Let such a state of things become general, universal, and the dark and perplexing riddle of human destiny is solved: — the judgment is past; heaven and hell have begun!

It may be said, that the guilty soul will still be in the hands of a compassionate God; and this is true. Beware, however, of making compassion in God what it often is in man, — a mere tenderness, I had almost said, a mere weakness. Nor is this all. We must not expect in the next world what is incompatible with its nature and purpose. We are placed here to make a beginning. We can begin here what course we please; and if we do not like it, we can go back, and begin again. Are you sure it will be so in the world to come? Why first a world of probation and then a world of retribution, if after all both are to be equally and alike probationary? Let us not run risks, where the error, if it be one, is irretrievable, and the stake infinite. How much better to be able to say, with the Apostle, "Therefore we are always confident, knowing that, while we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord: we are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord. Wherefore we labor, that, whether present or absent, we may be accepted of Him "
